

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. HANDBOOK OF THE INDIANS

NA. For all names beginning with this abbreviation and followed by Sa., Sra., or Señora, see Nuestra Señora.

Naagarnep. See Nagonub.

Naagetl. A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., just below Ayootl and above the mouth of Blue cr., n. w. Cal.

Naagetl.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905. Nai-a-gutl.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 138, 1833.

Naahmao (Nä-ah-nä'-o, 'turkey'). A clan of the Mahican.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 174, 1877.

Naai ('monocline'). A Navaho clan. Na'í.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 104, 1890. Na'í'ine.—Ibid. (ine = 'people'). Na'í'ine'.—Matthews, Navaho Legends, 30, 1897.

Naaiik (N'a'iek, or N'ē'iek, 'the bear-berry'). A village of the Nicola band of Ntlakyapamuk near Nicola r., 39 m. above Spences Bridge, Brit. Col.; pop. 141 in 1901, the last time the name appears.

Na-ai-ik.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 44, 1891. N'a'iek.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 174, 1900. N'ē'iek.—Ibid. Ni-ack.—Can. Ind. Aff., 1884, 189, 1885.

Naaiish (Na-ai'). A Yaquina village on the s. side of the mouth of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Naalgus-hadai (Na'a'lgas xā'da-i, 'dark-house people'). A subdivision of the Yatus, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Naalye (Na-al-ye). A division of the Skoton, living, according to the treaty of Nov. 18, 1854, on Rogue r., Oreg.—Compend. Ind. Treaties, 23, 1873.

Naansi. An extinct tribe, probably Caddoan, said by Douay to be numerous in 1687. They were allied with the Haqui and Nabiri in a war against the Kadodacho and the Hainai at the time La Salle's party were traveling toward the Mississippi after their leader's death.

Naansi.—Douay in Shea, Discov. Miss. Val., 217, 1652. Nansi.—Hennepin, New Discov., II, 41, 1698.

Naapope. See Nahpope.

Naas-Gloo. Given as a Chimmesyan village at the headwaters of Skeena r., w. Brit. Col.—Downie in Jour. Roy. Geog. Soc., XXXI, 253, 1861.

Naasumetunne ('people dwelling on or near the Naasu'). A clan or band, probably Yakonan, on a small stream called Naasu by the Naltunnetunne, s. of Salmon r. and n. of the mouth of Siletz r., Oreg.

Naaskaak.—Sculer (1846) in Jour. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., I, 233, 1848 (probably identical). Na'-ā-sū me'jūnnē.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 231, 1890 (Naltunnetunne name). Naat'ai.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, III, 81, 1854.

Nabatutuei. (Nabat'hü'-tü'ei, 'white village'). A traditional pueblo of the Tigua of Isleta, N. Mex.

Nabat'hü'-tü'ei.—Gatschet, Mythic Tale of Isleta, 210, 1891. Nah-bah-tōo-too-ee.—Lummis, Man who Married the Moon, 12, 1894. White Pueblo.—Gatschet, op. cit., 214.

Nabedache (Nä'-bai-dä'-che, said to be a fruit resembling the blackberry. Gatschet says the archaic name of the tribe was Nawadishe, from nitish, 'salt'; Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 390, 1878) corroborates this by saying that Naoudiche means 'salt', and that the village bearing this name was so called because of the salt supply near by). One of the 12 or more tribes of the Hasinai, or southern Caddo, confederacy. They spoke the common language of the group. Their main village stood for a century or more 3 or 4 leagues w. of Neches r. and near Arroyo San Pedro, at a site close to the old San Antonio road, which became known as San Pedro. This name clung to the place throughout the 18th century, and seems still to cling to it, since San Pedro cr. and the village of San Pedro, in Houston co., Tex., are in the same general vicinity as old San Pedro. In 1687 a well-beaten path led past this village to the Hasinai hunting grounds beyond the Brazos (Joutel in Margry, Déc., III, 325, 326, 332, 1878). It perhaps became a part of the later San Antonio road.

The Nouadiche mentioned by Bienville in 1700 (Margry, Déc., IV, 441, 1881) and the Amediche mentioned by La Harpe in 1719 (ibid., VI, 262, 1886) are clearly the Nabedache of San Pedro. Joutel (ibid., III, 388, 1878) tells us that the Naodiche village, which he passed through some 15 leagues N. E. of San Pedro, was allied to the latter, and it seems probable that it belonged to the same tribe. The Naouydiche mentioned by La Harpe in 1719, however, are not so easily identified with the Nabadache, since he associates them with the Tonkawa, calls them a wandering tribe which until La Salle's coming had been at war with the Kadohadacho, and on the same page mentions the Amediche apparently as a distinct tribe (Margry, Déc., vi, 262, 277, 1886). Yet the facts that the "great chief" of the Naouydiches, of whom La Harpe writes, spoke the language of the Nassonites, i. e., Caddoan, and that the Nouadiche of Bienville's account were the Nabadache, make it probable that those of La Harpe's account were the same people. Concerning the Nabadache of San Pedro, always in historic times the chief village of the tribe, the information is relatively full and satisfactory. They are the first Texas tribe of which there is a definite account, and because of their location on the western frontier of the Hasinai group and on the highway from Mexico to Louisiana they are frequently mentioned during the 18th century. La Salle passed through this village in 1686 on his way to the southern Nasoni, and by "the great Coenis village" of Douay's account of this expedition is meant specifically the Nabadache village w. of Neches r. and the Neche village just on the other side (Douay in French, Hist. Coll. La., iv, 204-205, 1852). Joutel's description of the Cenís (Hasinai), as distinguished from the southern Nasoni and the Kadohadacho, is based on his sojourn at the Nabadache and Neche villages (Margry, Déc., iii, 339-356, 1878); likewise Jesus María's invaluable account of the Hasinai was written at his mission near the Nabadache village (Francisco de Jesus María, MS. Relación, Aug. 15, 1691).

The political, social, and economic organization, as well as the general exterior relations of this tribe, were much the same as those of the confederate tribes, and are described under Neche (q. v.). Joutel, in 1687, informs us that from the western edge of the Nabadache village to the chief's house it was a "large league" (Margry, Déc., iii, 341, 1878). The houses on the way were grouped into "hamlets" of from 7 to 15, and surrounded by fields. Similar "hamlets" were scattered all the way to the Neches. In the middle of the settlement was a large assembly house, or town house (ibid., 343). Father Damian Massanet (Tex. Hist. Assn. Quar., ii, 303, 1899) thus describes the caddi's or chief's house as he saw it in 1690: "We came to the governor's house, where we found a number of Indians—men, women, and children. . . . The house is built of stakes thatched over with grass; it is about 20 varas high, is round, and has no windows, daylight entering through the door only; this door is like a room door such as we have here [in Mexico]. In the middle of the house is the fire, which is never extinguished by day or by night, and over the door on the inner side there is a little mound of pebbles very prettily arranged. Ranged around one-half of the house, inside, are 10 beds, which consist of a rug made of reeds, laid on 4 forked sticks. Over the rug they spread buffalo skins, on which they sleep. At the head and foot of the bed is attached another carpet, forming a sort of arch, which, lined with a very brilliantly colored piece of reed matting, makes what bears some resemblance to a very pretty alcove. In the other half of the house, where there are no beds, there are some shelves about 2 varas high, and on them are ranged large round baskets made of reeds (in which they keep their corn, nuts, acorns, beans, etc.), a row of very large earthen pots like our earthen jars, . . . and 6 wooden mortars for pounding corn in rainy weather (for when it is fair they grind it in the courtyard)." Besides what is learned of Hasinai foods in general we are told by Solís, who visited San Pedro in 1768, that the Nabadache used a root called tuqui, which was somewhat like the Cuban cassava. They ground it in mortars and ate it with bear's fat, of which they were particularly fond. Solís also tells us that resident there at this time was an Indian woman of great authority, named Sanate Adira, meaning 'great woman', or 'chief woman'; that she lived in a house of many rooms; that the other tribes brought her presents, and that she had 5 husbands and many servants (Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 280, 281, MS.).

Though the Nabadache were a peaceable people, they had many enemies, and in war they were high-spirited and cruel. In 1687 they and the Neche, aided by some of Joutel's party, made a successful campaign against the "Canohatinno." On the return one female captive was scalped alive and sent back to her people with a challenge (Joutel in Margry, Déc., iii, 377, 1878), while another was tortured to death by the women (ibid., 378). La Harpe reported that in 1714 the Nabadache (Amediches) and other Hasinai tribes were at war with the lower Natchitoch (ibid., vi, 193, 1886). In 1715 a party of Hasinai, including Nabadache, joined St. Denis in an expedition to Mexico. On the way a fierce battle was fought near San Marcos r. (apparently the Colorado) with 200 coast Indians, "always their chief enemies" (San Denis, Declaración, 1715, Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 124, MS.). Wars with the Apache were frequent. In 1719 Du Rivage met on Red r. a party of Naouydiches and other tribes who had just won a victory over this enemy (Margry, Déc., vi, 277, 1886). Shortly after this, La Harpe was joined near the Arkansas by the Naouydiche "great chief" and 40 warriors (ibid., 286). We are told that the Nabadache, with other Hasinai, aided the French in 1730 in their war with the Natchez (Mezières in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 229). Early in the 18th century the Nabadache seem generally to have been hostile to the Tonkawan tribes; but later, hatred for the Apache made them frequently allies, and we now hear of the Tonkawans selling Apache captives to the Nabadache. The possession at San Pedro in 1735 of some captive Apache women secured in this way threatened to cause war between the Spaniards and the Apache. The Spaniards, to avoid trouble, ransomed the women and sent them home (Gov. Barrios y Juaregui to the Viceroy, Apr. 17, 1753, MS. Archivo General, Historia, 299). In 1791, after fierce warfare between the Lipan and the combined northern Indians—the Wichita, Hasinai, and Tonkawa—the Apache endeavored to secure the aid of the Hasinai against the Tonkawa, but Gil Ybarbo, Spanish commander at Nacogdoches, prevented it (Ybarbo to the Governor, Apr. 26, 1791, Béxar Archives, Nacogdoches, 1758-93, MS.). Common hostility toward the Apache frequently made the Nabadache and the Comanche friends, but this friendship was unstable. The military relations of the Nabadache in the 19th century have not yet been investigated, but it is known that hostility to the Apache continued well into that period.

In May, 1690, Massanet and Capt. Domingo Ramón founded the first Texas mission (San Francisco de los Texas) at the Nabadache village, and a few months later the second (Santísima Nombre de María) was planted near by (Jesus María, Relación, 1691). On May 25, De León delivered to the Nabadache caddi a baston and a cross, and conferred on him the title of "governor of all his pueblos" (De León, Derrotero, 1690). This was done, as Jesus María clearly shows, under the mistaken notion that the Nabadache was the head tribe of the confederacy, and its caddi the head chief. These distinctions belonged, however, to the Hainai tribe and the great chenesi resident there (ibid., 18). This mistake, it is believed, caused some political disturbance in the confederacy. In 1690-91 an epidemic visited the tribe in common with its neighbors (Jesus María, Relación, 1691). Trouble, fomented by medicine-men and soldiers, soon arose between the missionaries and the Indians. In 1692 the chief, with most of his people, withdrew from the mission to the distant "fields," and refused to return (Massanet, MS., 1692). In 1693 the mission was abandoned (Clark in Tex. Hist. Assn. Quar., v, 200-201, 1902), and when restored in 1716 it was placed at the Neche village on the other side of the river. In 1727 Rivera (Diario, leg. 2093, 1736) reported that San Pedro was then occupied by the Neche, though formerly by the Nabadache. That the Neche had moved to San Pedro is perhaps true; but it seems improbable that the Nabadache had left the place, for long afterward the inhabitants of it continued to be called Nabadache (De Soto Bermudez docs., 1753, MS. Archivo General, Historia, 299; Mezières, Cartas, 1779). When Solís visited the Nabadache in 1768 their customs were still about as first described, except that they had nearly discarded the bow for the firelock, and were very inebriate, due, Solís claimed, to French liquor. In the middle of the 18th century French influence over the Hasinai greatly increased, and Spanish influence declined. In 1753 the Nabadache took part in a gathering of the tribes at the Nadote (Nadaco?) village, in which, it was reported, the Indians proposed killing all the Spaniards in eastern Texas; but St. Denis, of Natchitoches, prevented the attempt (Fr. Calahorra y Sanz, Feb. 23, 1753, MS. Archivo General, Historia, 299). This situation led to a plan, which failed, to have a garrison posted at San Pedro (Barrios y Juaregui to the Viceroy, ibid.). In 1778 or 1779 an epidemic reduced the population, and Mezières, writing from "San Pedro Nevadachos," situated apparently just where Joutel had found it, reported the number of warriors at somewhat more than 160 (Carta, Aug. 26, 1779, Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 241). In 1805 Sibley gave the number at 80 men; but about 1809 Davenport, who was at Nacogdoches, gave it as 100 (Report to Manuel Salcedo, copy dated Apr. 24, 1809, in Archivo General, Provincias Internas, 201). Sibley's and Davenport's reports and Austin's map of 1829 all indicate that the tribe had moved up Neches r. after 1779 (original Austin map, in Secretaría de Fomento, Mexico). From a letter in the Béxar Archives it appears that this migration may have occurred before 1784 (Neve to Cabello, Béxar Archives, Province of Texas, 1781-84). In the 19th century the Nabadache shared the fate of the other tribes of the Caddo and Hasinai confederacies, and the survivors are now on the (allotted) Wichita res. in Oklahoma, but are not separately enumerated. (H. E. B.)

Nabesnatana. A division of the Tenan-kutchin dwelling on the Nabesna branch of Tanana r., Alaska, and having the village of Khiltat at its mouth.—Allen, Rep. Alaska, 79, 1887.

Nabeyxa. A former tribe of Texas, mentioned as being N. E. of the Nabedache by Francisco de Jesus Maria, a missionary among the latter tribe, in his MS. relation of August, 1691. He included it in his list of Texas 'allies'. Inasmuch as in the same list he mentions the Naviti, apparently the Nabiri, the Nabeyxa must have been supposed by him to be a different tribe. It was probably Caddoan. (H. E. B.)

Nabiri. An extinct village or tribe of Texas, possibly Caddoan, mentioned by Douay in 1687 as populous and as allied with the Hagui and Naansi in a war against the Kadohadacho and the Hainai. According to De l'Isle's map of 1707 the people then lived N. of Washita r. in s. Arkansas. See Douay in Shea, Discov. Miss. Val., 2d ed., 221, 1903.

Nabari.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, III, 81, 1851. Nabiri.—Hennepin, New Discov., II, 41, 1698. Nabites.—Baudry des Lozières, Voy. à la Louisiane, 243, 1802 (probably identical). Nabiti.—De l'Isle, map 1701 in Winsor, Hist. Nacachau. One of the 9 tribes mentioned in a manuscript relation by Francisco de Jesus Maria, in 1691, as constituting the Hainai confederacy in Texas. They lived just N. of the Neche tribe and on the E. side of Neches r. In 1716 San Francisco de la Texas mission was established, according to Ratzel, in their village; and, according to one of Ratzel's companions, for them, the Neche, the Nabedache, and the Nacachau. The mission soon became known as San Francisco de los Neches and the name Nacachau disappears, the tribe being absorbed, probably, by the Neche. (H. E. B.)

Nacameri. A former pueblo of the Pima and the seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1688; situated on the n. bank of Rio Horcasitas, Sonora, Mexico. Pop. 362 in 1678, 62 in 1730.

Nacame.—Kino, map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott., 74, 1726. Rosario Nacameri.—Rivers (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, 513, 1864. Santa María Nacameri.—Zapata (1678), Ibid., 245.

Nacaniehe. Possibly a division of the Nabelache, a Caddo tribe with whom they were closely affiliated, although they were not always at peace with the tribes composing the confederacy. They first became known to the French about 1690, and according to La Harpe their villages in 1719 were n. of the Hainai. During the disturbances between the Spaniards and French in the 18th century the Nacaniehe seem to have abandoned their more northerly villages and, about 1760, to have concentrated on Trinity r., near the road leading to New Mexico. The tribe was included in the Texas census of 1790 as among those which were under the jurisdiction of Nacogdoches. The Nacaniehe were exposed to the same adverse influences that destroyed so large a part of their kindred. They clung to the Nabelache during the trying experiences of the first half of the 19th century, and if any survive they are with the Caddo (q. v.) on the Wichita res., Okla. A stream in e. Nacogdoches co., Texas, preserves their name. (A. C. F.)

Nacaniehe.—Census of 1790 in Tex. State Archives. Nacandiché.—Tontl (1690) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 71, 1846.

Nacau. A former tribe of Texas, closely associated with the Nacogdoche. They are mentioned in 1691 by Francisco de Jesus María in his manuscript list of Texas ('allies') as n. e. of his mission among the Nabelache. San Denis, in 1715, gave the Nacau, apparently the same, as one of the Hasinai or Texas tribes (Declaración, MS., 1715, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 123). In 1716 Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe mission was founded for this tribe and the Nacogdoche (Francisco Hidalgo and Manuel Castellano, letter to Pedro Mesquia, Oct. 6, 1716, MS. Archivo General). This fact, taken with the statement of Jesus María, makes it seem probable that the tribe lived n. of the Nacogdoche. After 1716 the Nacau seem to disappear from history as an independent group; it was perhaps absorbed by the Nacogdoche. (H. E. B.)

Nachaquatuck (from Wa'nashque-tuck, 'the ending creek,' because it was the end or boundary of the Eaton's Neck tract.—Tooker). A former Matinecoc village near the present Cold Spring, Suffolk co., Long id., N. Y. The name occurs as early as 1666.

Nachaquatuck.—Thompson, Long Id., i, 501, 1843.

Nacheninga ('No-heart-of-fear'). The name of at least two prominent Iowa chiefs, commonly called No Heart, both noted for their sterling qualities and highly regarded by both their tribesmen and the whites. Nacheninga the elder died a short time before Catlin's visit to the tribe in 1832, when he was succeeded by his son, who, however, was regarded as subordinate to Mahaskah the younger. The junior Nacheninga has been described as a fine specimen of his race physically, and as "the faithful husband of one wife." His portrait was painted by Catlin in 1832. In behalf of the Iowa he signed the treaty of St. Louis, Nov. 23, 1837, and in the same year visited Washington, where his portrait was painted for the War Department by Charles B. King, and is now preserved in the U. S. National Museum (see illustration). Nacheninga was a signer also of the treaty of Great Nemaha agency, Neb., Oct. 19, 1838; the treaty of Washington, May 17, 1854, and that of Great Nemaha agency, Mar. 6, 1861. The name is variously spelled Nachewinga, Nan-chee-ning-a, Nau-che-ning-ga, Non-che-ning-ga, Non-gee-ninga, and Notch-ee-ning-a. Consult Fulton, Red Men of Iowa, 124, 1882; Catlin, North American Indians, II, 1844; Donaldson in National Museum Report for 1885, 1886.

NACHENINGA (AFTER C. B. KING)

Nachvak. An Eskimo missionary station of the Moravians in Labrador, close to C. Chidley.—Duckworth in Proc. Cambridge Philos. Soc., x, 288, 1900.

Nacisi. A small tribe, possibly of Caddoan stock, formerly dwelling in the region of Red r., La. They were first mentioned by Joutel in 1687, at which time they were at enmity with the Cenis (Caddo confederacy). When Bienville and St Denis were exploring Red r. of La., in 1700, they found on that stream a village of the Nacisi consisting of 8 houses. They were still in this neighborhood in 1741, but during the vicissitudes of the 18th century seem to have drifted southward beyond the border of the French province, for in 1790 they are mentioned among the tribes under the jurisdiction of Nacogdoches, in Texas. (A. C. F.)

Nacogdoche (Na-ko-hodó-tsi). A tribe of the Hasinai confederacy of Texas. It has been said that their language differed from that of the Hasinai group in general, but there is much evidence to indicate that this is not true. For example, Ramón, who founded missions at the Neche, Hainai, Nasoni, and Nacogdoche villages in 1716, states in his report that "these four missions will comprise from four to five thousand persons of both sexes, all of one idiom" (Representación, July 22, 1716, in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVII, 160, MS.). On the same day the missionaries wrote that the Nacogdoche mission "N. S. de Guadalupe . . . is awaiting people of the same language and customs" as those of the Indians of mission Concepción, i. e., the Hainai (ibid., 163). In 1752, when the governor of Texas was arranging to inspect the villages of the Hainai, Nabadache, Nacogdoche, Nasoni, and Nadote, Antonio Barrera was appointed interpreter, because he was a person "understanding with all perfection the idiom of these Indians," the implication being that they all spoke a single language (Jacinto de Barrios y Juaregui, Oct. 30, 1752, in Archivo General, Hist., 299, MS.). Mezières said that the Nabadache, Nadaco (Anadarko), Hainai, and Nacogdoche spoke the same language (letter to Croix, Feb. 20, 1778, Mem. de Nueva España, XXVIII, 229, MS.). Other similar evidence might be cited.

Their main village at the opening of the 18th century and for a long time thereafter was approximately on the site of the modern city of Nacogdoches, where four Indian mounds existed until recently. This place seems to have been called Nevantin. The Nacogdoche were mentioned apparently by the Gentleman of Elvas in his account of the De Soto expedition; but they were first made definitely known by Jesus María in 1691, who called them the Nazadachotzi, indicated correctly their location, and classified them as one of the nine Aseney (Hasinai) tribes (Relación, 108, MS.). It seems probable that the Nacogdoche are distinct from the Aquodoez, with whom Pénicaut in 1714 said the Assinaïs were at war (Margry, Déc., v, 504, 1883). At this time San Denis found the Nacogdoche, Hainai, Nadaco (Anadarko), and others at war with the lower Natchitoch, but he restored peace among them (La Harpe in Margry, Déc., vi, 193, 1886; see also letter of Macartij, Nov. 17, 1763, Nacogdoches Archives, MS.). Espinosa tells us that the Nasoni, whose main village was some 25 m. to the N., were especially closely allied with the Nacogdoche, and came to their village for some of their principal religious observances (Crónica Apostólica, I, 425, 1746).

In July, 1716, the Franciscans of the college at Zacatecas established their first Texas mission at the main Nacogdoche village for this tribe and the Nacao. This mission became the headquarters of the president, Fray Antonio Margil de Jesus (Espinosa, Diario, entries for July 5-8, MS., Archivo General). In 1719 the mission, like all the others of E. Texas, was abandoned through fear of a French attack, but was reestablished in 1721 on the same site (Peña, Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, XXVIII, 44, MS.). The mission continued to exist long after three of its neighbors had been removed; but it had very little success, and in 1773 it was abandoned. The Spanish settlers, who were removed at this time from Adaes, and at whose head was Antonio Gil Ybarbo, were allowed to settle on the Trinity, founding in 1774 a place which they called Pilar de Bucareli. Early in 1779 they migrated, without authority, to the site of the Nacogdoches mission. The modern city of Nacogdoches dates from this time.

The Nacogdoche were nominally within the Spanish jurisdiction, but the French early gained their affection through the unlicensed trade which they conducted with the Indians. The French supplied guns, ammunition, knives, cloth, vermilion, and knickknacks, in return for horses, skins, bear's fat in great quantities, corn, beans, and Apache captives. This trade, particularly that in firearms, was opposed by the Spanish officials, and as a result there were frequent disputes on the frontier, the Indians sometimes taking one side and sometimes the other. In 1733, for example, two Nacogdoche chiefs reported at Adaes that the French had offered them a large reward if they would destroy the Spanish presidio of Adaes (Expediente sobre la Campaña, etc., 1739, Archivo General, Provincias Internas, xxxii, MS.). The charge was denied, of course, by the French. Again, in August, 1750, it was said that the Nacogdoche chief, Chacaiauchia, or Sanchez, instigated as he claimed by San Denis of Natchitoches, went to the Nacogdoches mission, threatened the life of the missionary, Father Calahorra y Sanz, and ordered him to depart with all the Spaniards (Testimonio de Autos de Pesquiza sobre Comercio Ylicito, 1751, Béxar Archives, Adaes, 1739-55, MS.). On the other hand, when in 1752 a gathering of tribes was held at the Nadote village to discuss a plan for attacking all the Spanish establishments, the Nacogdoche chief, apparently Chacaiauchia, and San Denis both appear in the light of defenders of the Spaniards (Testimony of Calahorra y Sanz in De Soto Bermudez, Report of Investigation, Archivo General, Hist., 299, MS.). Chacaiauchia, or Sanchez, seems to have retained the chieftaincy a long time, for in 1768 Solís tells of being visited at the mission by Chief Sanchez, a man of large following (Diario in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 282, MS.).

Some data as to the numerical strength of the tribe are extant. In 1721, when Aguayo refounded the mission, he provided clothing for "the chief and all the rest," a total of 390 (Peña, Diario, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 44, MS.). This may have included some Nacao, and, on the other hand, it may not have included all of the Nacogdoche tribe. It was reported that in 1733 the two Nacogdoche chiefs mentioned above went to Adaes with 60 warriors (Expediente sobre la Campaña, 1739, op. cit.). It is not known whether the warriors were all Nacogdoche or not, but that is the implication. In 1752 De Soto Bermudez inspected the Nacogdoche pueblo and reported that it consisted of 11 "rancherías grandes," containing 52 warriors, besides many youths nearly able to bear arms (Rep. of Investigation, 1752, Archivo General, Hist., 299). Croix's list of 1778 does not include the Nacogdoche, unless they are his Nacogdochitos, a group of 30 families living on the Attoyac (Relación Particular, Archivo General, Prov. Intern., 182). According to a census of 1790, on the authority of Gatschet, the Nacogdoche were reduced to 34 men, 31 women, 27 boys, and 23 girls. Davenport, in 1809, reported the Nacogdochitos as comprising 50 men (Noticia, Archivo General, Prov. Intern., 201, MS.).

By 1752 the Nacogdoche pueblo had been removed some 3 leagues northward (De Soto Bermudez, op. cit.). When this transfer took place is not clear, but Mezières says that they deserted the mission at once (Carta, Aug. 23, 1779, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 225, MS.). In 1771 Gov. Barrios reported them as still near the Hainai (Informe, 2, MS.). It seems probable that a considerable part of the Nacogdoche tribe was absorbed in the general population at Nacogdoches after the settlement of the Spaniards in 1779, for census reports thereafter show a large number of Indians and mixed-bloods at that place. After this time the remnant of the tribe seems sometimes to appear as Nacogdochitos. Morfi, about 1781, located this tribe on the Attoyac. In 1809 Davenport, writing from Nacogdoches, did not name the Nacogdoches in the list of surrounding tribes, but placed the Nacogdochitos on the Angelina, 5 leagues n. of Nacogdoches (Noticia, Archivo General, Prov. Intern., 201, MS.). A Spanish map made between 1795 and 1819 shows the "Nacodoches" above where Davenport put the "Nocogdochitos," i. e., on the e. side of the Angelina about halfway between Nacogdoches and Sabine r. (MS. Mapa Geográfica de las Provincias Septentrionales de esta Nueva España).

In habit, ceremony, and social organization the Nacogdoche resembled the other tribes of the Hasinai confederacy.

Nacono. One of the tribes of the Hasinai, or southern Caddo, confederacy. In 1691 Francisco de Jesus María (Relación, 108, MS.) located it s. e. of the Neche and Nabelache tribes. In 1721 the Indians of "el Macono," evidently the same, lived 5 leagues from the Neche tribe. In 1716 San Francisco de los Texas mission was founded near the Neche and Nacachau villages to minister to these two tribes and to the Nabelache and Nacono (Hidalgo, letter, Oct. 6, 1716, MS., Archivo General). Espinosa, who was present at the founding of San Joseph de los Nasones misson, said that it was composed of Nasoni and Nacono, but the latter were more likely the Nadaco (Anadarko). In 1721 Aguayo was visited on the Neches r. by 100 Indians from el Macono, who were still regarded as belonging to San Francisco mission. Peña, in his diary of this expedition, makes the interesting statement that "their chief, who is also chief priest to their idols, is blind. It is presumed that after having been chief many years, he put out his eyes, according to a custom of the Indians, in order to become chief priest among them" (Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 35, MS.). As their name disappears thereafter, unless they were the Nacomones of Rivera's list (1727), they were, apparently, like numerous other Texan tribes, absorbed by their stronger neighbors. (H. E. B.)

Nacori. A former Opata pueblo and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1645; situated on Rio Viejo, an e. tributary of the upper Yaqui, lat. 29° 30', lon. 109°, e. Sonora, Mexico. Pop. 450 in 1678; 281 in 1730. The town has suffered greatly from Apache depredations, the last attack being made in 1883. The pueblo numbered 339 persons in 1900, of whom a few were Yaqui or Pima, the remainder being classed as Spaniards.

Nacotchtank. A tribe or band, probably of the Conoy, formerly living on the Anacostia branch of the Potomac, about Washington, D. C. Their principal village, of the same name, was near the present Anacostia (a corruption of the name of the tribe), in 1608. Smith seems to make them of Algonquian stock, but Shea says they were probably Iroquoian. The Conestoga were their enemies.

Nadamin. A tribe or settlement mentioned by Joutel in 1687 (Margry, Déc., III, 410, 1878) as an ally of the Hasinai (Caddo). They probably lived at that time in s. e. Texas, near Red r.

Naden-hadai (Ná'dan ná'da-i, 'Naden river people'). A subdivision of the Koetas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida. Unlike the rest of the family this subdivision remained on Queen Charlotte ids. and settled on Naden r.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Nadohotzoun ('point of the mountain'). A band of the Chiricahua Apache (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 115, 1890), essentially the same as the Natootzuzn of the White Mountain Apache and the Nagozugn of the Pinal Coyoteris.

Nadowa. A name, expressing utter detestation, applied by various Algonquian tribes to a number of their neighboring and most inveterate enemies. Its use was not limited to the tribes of a single linguistic stock, the historical references showing that it was applied in some instances, in a modified form, to Eskimo, Siouan, and Iroquoian peoples. For synonyms see Eskimo, Dakota, Iroquois, Ioua, Teton, and Nottoway.

The etymology of the term is in doubt. The analysis proposed by Gerard (Am. Anthropol., VI, 319, 326, 1904), namely, 'he goes to seek flesh to eat,' while grammatically permissible, is historically improbable, being too general. In s. United States the original application of the word appears to have been to various small, dark-colored poisonous rattle-snakes, inhabiting the lake and prairie regions, such as the Crotalophorus tergeminus (Sistrurus catenatus), and possibly to C. kirtlandi, the black massasauga. Cuoq gives as the meaning of the term natoce, a "kind of large serpent formerly quite common in the neighborhood of Michillimackinac, i. e., Mackinac, the flesh of which the Indians ate; the Algonkin and all nations of the Algonquian tongue give this name to the Iroquois and to tribes of the Iroquoian stock." The Menominee (Hoffman) apply the term to the massasauga rattlesnake, and the Chippewa (Tanner) to a "thick, short rattlesnake." In Tanner's list of Ottawa tribal names are found Nautouaig, Naudoways, 'rattlesnakes,' and Matchenautoways, 'bad Naudoways,' and in a footnote to the word Anego, 'ant,' it is stated that these same Naudoway Indians relate a fable of an old man and an old woman to the effect that these two watched an ant-hill until the ants therein became transformed into white men, and the eggs which these ants were carrying in their mouths were transformed into bales of merchandise. But in none of these references are the people so named thereby defined in such manner that without other information they may be recognized by other nomenclature.

The word "Sioux" is itself an abbreviation of the diminutive of this term, namely, Nadowe-is-in, literally 'he is a small massasauga rattlesnake,' the sense-giving part of the word being dropped, but signifying 'enemy,' 'enemies.' This diminutive form, with the qualifying epithet Mascoutens, was a name of the Iowa and the Teton. In Virginia the term, which became Anglicized into "Nottoway," was applied to an Iroquoian tribe resident there. In this locality it is probable that the name was applied originally to the rattlesnake common to this eastern region. (J. N. B. H.)

Naenshya (Nae'nax'a, 'dirty teeth'). The name of two Kwakiutl gentes, one belonging to the Koskimo, the other to the Nakomgilisala.—Boas in Nat. Mus. Rep. 1895, 329, 1897.

Na-gan-nab. See Nagonub.

Nageuktormint ('horn people'). A tribe of Eskimo who summer at the mouth of Coppermine r. and winter on Richardson r., Mackenzie Ter., Canada.

Deer-Horn Esquimaux.—Franklin, Journ. to Polar Sea, II, 178, 1824. Na-gè-uk-tor-mè-ut.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., I, 362, 1851. Naggiuktop-méut.—Petitot in Bib. Ling. et Ethnog. Am., III, xi, 1876. Naggo-ook-tor-mè-oot.—Richardson in Franklin, Second Exped., 174, 1828. Nappa-arktok-towock.—Franklin, Journ. to Polar Sea, II, 178, 1824.

Nagokaydn ('pass in the mountains'). A band of the Pinal Coyoters at San Carlos agency, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Nagonabe (Nagünabä). A former Chippewa village in lower Michigan (Smith in Ind. Aff. Rep., 53, 1851). A chief of this name represented a band on "South Monistic" r. in 1835 (Mich. Pion. Coll., XII, 622, 1888). See also Nagonub, Naguonabe.

Nagonub (Niganübi, or Niganüb, 'the foremost sitter'). A Chippewa Indian, born about 1815, and first mentioned as attracting the attention of Gen. Lewis Cass by his sprightliness while but a mere lad. So well pleased was Cass that he gave Nagonub a medal and a written token of his precocity. He attained notoriety through his spirited and often fiery oratory, and his unusually courteous manners won for him the declaration that he was the "beau ideal of an Indian chief" (Morse in Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 349, 1857). Nagonub is said also to have been an especial favorite with the white ladies, whom he greeted with the ease and grace of a courtier. He signed as first chief of the Fond du Lac Chippewa the treaties of La Pointe, Wis., Oct. 4, 1842, and Sept. 30, 1854. His portrait, painted by J. O. Lewis and copied by King in 1827, hung in the Indian Gallery of the Smithsonian building at Washington, but was destroyed by fire in 1865. His name is also written Naa-gar-nep, Na-gan-nab, and Naw-gaw-nub. (C. T.)

Nagosugn. A band of the Pinal Coyoters found in 1881 by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890) at San Carlos agency, Ariz.; correlated with the Natootzuzn of the White Mountain Apache, and with the Nadohotzozn of the Chiricahua.

Naguatex. A town and province w. of the Mississippi, visited by Moscoso, of De Soto's army, in 1542. Located by Lewis (Narr. De Soto, 238, 1907) on the w. side of Washita r., in the present Clark co., Ark. The tribe was evidently Caddoan.

Nagateux.—Harris, Voy. and Trav., I, 810, 1705.

Naguatex.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 196, 1850. Naguatex.—Barton, New Views, app., 9, 1798.

Nagnchee (Nagu'tsi'). A former important Cherokee settlement about the junction of Soquee and Santee rs., in Nacoochee valley, at the head of Chattahoochee r., in Habersham co., Ga. The meaning of the word is lost, and it is doubtful if it be of Cherokee origin. It may have some connection with the name of the Yuchi Indians.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 526, 1900.

Cauchi.—Pardo (ca. 1598) quoted by Mooney, op. cit., 28 (probably identical). Nacoochee.—Common map form. Nae oche.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792. Nocococce.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887.

Naguonabe ('feather end,' according to Warren, evidently referring to a feather at the end of a row of others). The civil chief of the Mille Lac Chippewa of Minnesota in the first half of the 19th century, and the principal man of the Wolf clan. He was descended from a Chippewa woman and a Dakota chief. In behalf of his tribe he signed the general treaty of Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825, and the treaty between the Chippewa and the United States made at Fond du Lac, Wis., Aug. 6, 1826. His name is also written Nauquanabee and Nagwunabee.

Nagus (Nā'gas, 'town inhabited'). A town of the Hagi-lanas family of the Haida on an inlet on the s. w. coast of Moresby id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Nagwunabee. See Naguonabe.

Nahaego. A Shoshonean division formerly living in Reese r. valley and about Austin in central Nevada. There were several bands, numbering 530 in 1873.

Na-haé-go.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 52, 1874. Reese River Indians.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 26, 1863. Tutoi band.—Ibid. (named from Tutoi or Totóna, their chief).

Nahane ('people of the west.'—A. F. C.). An Athapascan division occupying the region of British Columbia and Yukon Ter. between the Coast range and the Rocky mts., from the n. border of the Sekani, about 57° n., to that of the Kutchin tribes, about 65° n. It comprises the Tahltan and Takutine tribes forming the Tahltan division, the Titshotina and Etagottine tribes forming the Kaska division, and the Esbataottine and Abbatottine (considered by Petitot to be the same tribe), Sazeutina, Ettchaottine, Etagottine, Kraylongottine, Klokegottine, and perhaps Lakuyip and Tsetsaut. They correspond with Petitot's Montagnard group, except that he included also the Sekani. The language of the Nahane however constitutes a dialect by itself, entirely distinct from Sekani, Carrier, or Kutchin. The western divisions have been powerfully influenced by their Tlingit neighbors of Wrangell, and have adopted their clan organization with maternal descent, the potlatch customs of the coast tribes, and many words and expressions of their language. The two principal social divisions or phratries are called Raven and Wolf, and the fact that Sazeutina and Titshotina seem to signify 'Bear people' and 'Grouse people' respectively, leads Morice to suspect that these groups are really phratries or clans. The eastern Nahane have a loose paternal organization like the Sekani and other Athapascan tribes farther e. According to Morice the Nahane have suffered very heavily as a result of white contact. He estimates the entire population at about 1,000. Consult Morice in Trans. Can. Inst., VII, 517-534, 1904. See Tahltan. (J. R. S.)

Nahapassumkeck. A Massachusetts village, in 1616, in the n. part of Plymouth co., Mass., probably on the coast.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., VI, 108, 1837.

Nahawas-hadai (Na xawa's xā'da-i, 'watery-house people'). A subdivision of the Salendas, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. They used to give away so much grease at their feasts that the floor of their house was said to be "muddy" with it, hence the name.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Nahche (Na-ai-che, 'mischievous,' 'meddlesome.'—George Wrattan). An Apache warrior, a member of the Chiricahua band. He is the second son of the celebrated Cochise, and as hereditary chief succeeded his elder brother, Tazi, on the death of the latter. His mother was a daughter of the notorious Mangas Coloradas. As a child Nahche was meddlesome and mischievous, hence his name. He was the leading spirit in the many raids that almost desolated the smaller ents of Arizona and New Mexico northern Chihuahuas and Sonora between 1881 and 1886, for which Geronimo, a fine man and malcontent rather a warrior, received the chief credit. In the latter year Geronimo's band, so of which Nahche was actually the as captured by General Miles and prisoners of war successively to Alabama, and finally to Ft Sill, where Nahche still resides, re- by his own people as well as by tes. He is now (1907) about 49 age. In his prime as a warrior described as supple and graceful, ig, flexible hands, and a rather ne face. His present height is in. Col. H. L. Scott (inf'n, 1907),

r years in charge of the Chiricahua in Oklahoma, speaks of Nahche as a forceful and reliable man, faithfully performing the duties assigned to as a prisoner, whether watched or He was proud and self-respecting, as regarded by the Chiricahua at as their leader. elta (Na-hel-ta). A subdivision of asta (q. v.) tribe of Oregon.—Sen. oc. 48, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 10, 1873. Itashkan ('town on outside of '). A former Tlingit town on water bay, w. coast of Admiralty laska, belonging to the Hutenuwu people. Pop. 246 in 1880, but subsequently abandoned for Killianoo.

Nahy'ch-än.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.
Nahy'schik'-än.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 118, 1895.
Nautakon.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Nahpocille. The chief village of the Cathlapotle tribe of the Chinookan family at the mouth of Lewis r., Clarke co., Wash.—Lyman in Oreg. Hist. Soc. Quar., 1, 322, 1900.

Nahpope (Nēpope, 'soup'). A prominent warrior of Black Hawk's band of Sauk and Foxes in the Black Hawk war of 1832. According to Whittlesey (Wis. Hist. Coll., 1, 71-2, 84, repr. 1903) Black Hawk was opposed to the war, but was overruled by the young men, who were sustained by Nahpope, who manifested intense hatred of the Americans. He was, however, largely influenced by Waupeshek, the so-called Prophet. Little has been recorded regarding his life. It is known that he took an active part in the Black Hawk war, and special mention is made of his command in the battle of Wisconsin heights, on Wisconsin r., near the present Sauk City, Wis. Here Nahpope's band, reinforced by a score of Black Hawk's warriors, made a valiant stand to cover the flight of the main body of his people down the bluffs and across the river, which was accomplished with slight loss. During the night following the battle the Americans were for a time in a panic, caused by the noise in the Indian camp, which proved to have been only the applause of a speech by Nahpope in which he endeavored to arouse the Winnebago to remain with them in the contest. Nahpope continued in the war to its close, was captured and imprisoned with Black Hawk and his son, and finally released with them. While Nahpope was confined at Jefferson Barracks, Catlin painted his portrait. As his name is not appended to any treaty made by the Sauk and Foxes with the United States, the omission may be attributed to his contempt for the Americans. In the summer preceding the Black Hawk war he visited the English authorities at Ft Malden, Ontario, to consult them in regard to the rights of the Indians to their lands. After his release from prison nothing more is heard of him. His name is also written Naapope and Neapope. (c. r.)

Nahu (Na'-hū). The Medicine clan of the Honani (Badger) phratry of the Hopi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891.

Nahuey.—Ibid.

Nalch, Nalchl. See Nahche.

Naideni. A former Opata pueblo in the vicinity of Fronteras, N. E. Sonora, Mexico. It is probable that the natives of Naideni were identical with the Neideniba mentioned by Mota-Padilla in 1742.

Naideni.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 530, 1892. Neideniba.—Mota-Padilla, Hist. de la Conquista, 361, 1742 (referring to the inhabitants). Neidenivas.—Ibid.

Naig. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Naikun (Nā-ikūn, 'house-point'). A semi-legendary Haida town that stood near the famous sand-spit at Graham id., Brit. Col., which bears its name. Anciently it was occupied by several families, including the Huados, Kuna-lanas, and Stlenga-lanas, but owing to internal troubles they separated, abandoning the town. Later on the Naikun-stustai settled there, and still later the Kuna-lanas returned. John Work, in 1836–41, assigned to Naikun 5 houses and 122 inhabitants. This must have been the Kuna-lanas town. It has been long abandoned. (J. R. S.)

Naiku'n.—Boas in 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Nai-koon.—Dawson, Q. Charlotte Ids., 34B, 1880. Nā-ikūn.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905. Nē ooon.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 489, 1855. Nē-kōn hādē.—Krause, Tlinkit Indianer, 304, 1885.

Naikun-kegawai (Nā-iku'n qē'gawa-i, 'those born at Naikun'). An important family of the Raven clan of the Haida. It seems to have been a sort of aristocratic branch of the Huados, receiving its name from the old town at Naikun, or Rose spit, Queen Charlotte Ids., whence the family originally came. They are still fairly numerous. After abandoning Naikun they lived a long time at C. Ball with the Huados, and moved with them to the town of Skidegate. (J. R. S.)

Ellzu oathlana-oon-hidery.—Deans, Tales from the Hidery, 15, 1899 (= 'noble Gahlins-kun people'). Naē kun k'erauā'i.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Naila. A former Chumashan village near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Nain. A former Moravian mission, built in 1757 near the present Bethlehem, Pa., and named from the ancient town in Galilee. It was established for the converted Indians, chiefly Delawares, who wished to live separately from their tribe, and for this purpose land was obtained from the state government. In May, 1763, a new and enlarged chapel was dedicated, the congregation having increased in numbers and prosperity. This condition, however, was of short duration, for before the year had closed the unfriendly Indians commenced their attacks, and soon the congregation was blockaded on all sides. In November of the same year Nain was abandoned, the Indians removing to Philadelphia in accordance with the order of the governor of Pennsylvania. Consult Lœkiel, Hist. Miss. United Brethren, 1794. See Missions.

Nain. A Moravian Eskimo mission on the E. coast of Labrador, lat 56° 40', begun in 1771 (Hind, Lab. Penin., II, 199, 1863; Thompson, Moravian Missions, 228, 1886). See Missions.

Nak. A Kuskwogniut Eskimo village on the N. bank of Kuskokwim r., Alaska. Nag-miout.—Zugoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXI, map, 1850.

Nakai ('white stranger,' i. e., Spaniard). A Navaho clan, the members of which are descended from a white woman who had been captured by the Ute from a settlement in the vicinity of Socorro, N. Mex. Cf. Nakaydi.

Nakai.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 103, 1890. Nakai.—Matthews, Navaho Legends, 30, 1897. Nakaiçine.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, op. cit. (çine = 'people'). Nakaiçine.—Matthews, Navaho Legends, op. cit., 30, 146.

Nakaidoklini ('freckled Mexican.'—Matthews). An Apache medicine-man, called Babbyduclone, Bardudeclenny, Bobby-dok-linny, Nakaydoklunni, Nockay-Delklinne, etc., by the whites, influential among the White Mountain Indians in 1881, near Camp Apache, Ariz. He taught them a new dance, claiming it would bring dead warriors to life. In an attempt to arrest him, August 30, the Apache scouts with the troops turned upon the soldiers, resulting in a fight in which several were killed on each side, including the medicine-man himself. See Bourke in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 505, 1892; Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 704, 1896.

Nakalas-hadai (Na q'ā'las xā'da-i, 'clay-house people'). A subdivision of the Koetas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida, living principally in Alaska.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Nakalnas-hadai (Na-k'āl nas xā'da-i, 'empty-house people'). (Given by Boas (Fifth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 27, 1889) as a subdivision of the Yaku-lanas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida; but in reality it is only a house-name belonging to that family.)

Na k'al nas :hadā'i.—Boas, op. cit.

Nakanawan (Nā'ka'na'wan). A division of the Caddo.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1092, 1896.

Nakankoyo (Nākan kōyo). A former village of the Maidu at Big Spring, in Big meadows, on the S. fork of Feather r., Plumas co., Cal. The name is sometimes used for the people of the whole valley. (R. B. D.)

Naknahula (Narnā'rula, ? 'rising above other tribes'). A gens of the Koekso-tenok, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 330, 1897.

Nakoak. A former Chinook town on the s. side of Columbia r., Oreg.

Naqō'ix.—Boas, inf'n, 1905. Naqūaiχ.—Gatschet, MS., B. A. E., 1877.

Nakoaktok (Nā'q'oaqtōq, or Nā'k'war'-da'x, 'ten-gens tribe'). A Kwakiutl tribe on Seymour inlet, Brit. Col., with the Gyeksem, Kwakokutl, Sisintlae, Tsitsi-melekala, and Walas gentes, according to Boas. According to Dawson the winter town of these people in 1885 was in Blunden harbor, to which they had moved from an older town, Kikwistok. Their summer village was named Mapakum, and they had a fishing station called Awuts. Pop. 104 in 1901, 90 in 1906.

Nahcoctaws.—Brit. Col. map, 1872. Nah-keoock-to.—Boas in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 226, 1887. Nah-keuch-to.—Sproat in Can. Ind. Aff., 148, 1879. Nah-knoock-to.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1883, pt. I, 190, 1884. Nahkwoch-to.—Sproat, op. cit., 145. Nahwahta.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 166, 1901. Nā'k'oartok.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 53, 1890. Nakok-taws.—Brit. Col. map, 1872. Nakwahto.—Tolmie and Dawson, Vocab. Brit. Col., 118B, 1884. Nak-wartoq.—Boas in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 226, 1887. Nā'k'war'-da'x.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., v, pt. II, 322, 1902. Nā'kwok-to.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 65, 1887. Nā'q'-oaqtōq.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 329, 1897. Nāqoartoq.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 130, 1887. Nar-kock-tau.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. Nuk wul tuh.—Tolmie and Dawson, op. cit., 119B.

Nakolkavik. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the left bank of Kuskokwim r., near the mouth, Alaska. Pop. 193 in 1880.

Nacholchavigamut.—Spurr and Post quoted by Baker, Geog. Diet. Alaska, 1902. Naghaikhavigamute.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, map, 1884. Naghiikhavigamute.—Ibid., 17. Nakolkavik.—Baker, op. cit.

Nakomgilisala (Naqō'mg'ilisala, 'always staying in their country'). A Kwakiutl tribe which formerly lived at C. Scott, at the N. end of Vancouver id., but has since moved to Hope id., farther s. This and the Tlatlasikoala together receive the name of Nawiti from the whites. The two tribes numbered 73 in 1897. The Nakomgilisala gentes are Gyeksem and Naenshya.

Nak'o'mgyilisila.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 53, 1890. Naqô'mg'ilisala.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 329, 1897. Naqomqilis.—Boas in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 226, 1887. Ne-kum'-ke-lis-la.—Blenkinsop quoted by Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 65, 1887. Nokumkteilla.—Brit. Col. map, 1872.

Nakons-hadai (Na qons rä'da-i, 'great-house people'). A subdivision of the Yadus, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida, named from one of their houses. The Yadus were a part of the Stustas (q. v.).—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Nakoshkeni (Nakôshkē'ni, 'place of the dam'). A former Modoc settlement at the junction of Lost r. with Tule lake, Oreg.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxxii, 1890.

Nakotchokutchin. A Kutchin tribe dwelling on the lower Mackenzie r., s. of the Kawchodinneb, in lat. 68° N., lon. 133° W. Their hunting grounds are E. of the Mackenzie as far as Anderson r., and their chief game is the caribou. In former days they waged intermittent warfare against the Eskimo of Mackenzie r., with whom, however, they have always traded. Their men numbered 50 in 1866.

Bastard.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can. for 1888, 200B, 1889. Gens de la Grande Riviere.—Ross, MS. notes on Tinne, B. A. E. Loucheux.—Franklin, Journ. Polar Sea, 261, 1824. Mackenzie's B. Louchieux.—Ross, MS. notes on Tinne, B. A. E. Nakotcho-Kuttchin.—Petitot in Bull. Soc. de Geog. Paris, chart, 1875. Nakotchpô-ondjig-Kouttchin.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 361, 1891 (= 'people of the river with high banks'). Nakotchpô-ondjig-Kuttchin.—Petitot, Diet. Dènè-Dindjé, xx, 1876. Na-kutch-oo-un-jeek.—Gibbs, MS. notes from Ross (= 'half-caste Indians'). Na-kutch-ū'-ūn-jūk kūtchin.—Ross, MS. notes on Tinne, 474, B. A. E.

Nakrastli ('it flowed with arrows of the enemy'). A village of the Nikozli-autin at the outlet of Stuart lake, Brit. Col. Pop. 178 in 1902, 192 in 1906.

Na-ka-rtli.—Morrice in Trans. Can. Inst., 188, 1890. Na'krastli.—Ibid. Na'krastti.—Morrice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., x, 109, 1892.

Nakuimana (Nā'kuimana, 'bear people'). A local band of the (Southern) Cheyenne. (J. M.)

Nakuntlan. The original village of the Tsilkotin, on Nakuntlan lake at the head of Salmon r., Brit. Col., and once the most populous, but now almost deserted.

Nakoontloon.—Tolmie and Dawson, Vocabs. Brit. Col., 122B, 1884. Nakunt'lun.—Morrice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., x, 109, 1892. Tsoolootum.—Gatschet in Can. Pac. Ry. Rep., 179, 1877.

Nakwutthume (Na'-qūt-t'cū'-me, 'at the grass higher up the stream'). A former village of the Chetco on Chetco r., Oreg., above all their other villages.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 236, 1890.

Nalekuitk (Nā'lekuitk). A clan of the Wikenos, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 328, 1897.

Nalkitgoniash. A Micmac village or band in 1760, perhaps in Nova Scotia.—Frye (1760) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 115, 1809.

Naltunnetunne ('people among the mushrooms'). An Athapascan tribe formerly living on the coast of Oregon between the Tututni and the Chetco. They were not divided into villages, and had a dialect distinct from that of the Tututni. The survivors are now on Siletz res., Oreg., numbering 77 in 1877, according to Victor (Overland Mo., VII, 347, 1877).

Nal'-te-ne-me' jūnnē.—Dorsey, Chetco MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Nal'tenē jūnnē.—Dorsey, Tutu MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Nal'-tūn-nē' jūnnē.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 236, 1890. Noltanana.—Newcomb in Ind. Aff. Rep., 162, 1861. Noltanac-nah.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1867, 62, 1868. Nolt-nat-nahs.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 470, 1865. Noltonatria.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 300, 1877. Nootanana.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1863, 505, 1864. Nult-nort-nas.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 495, 1865. Nul-to-nat-na.—Siletz agency roll, 1884. Nūltō-nāt-tēne.—Everette, Tutu MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883 (trans., 'people by the ocean').

Nama (Nāmā, 'sturgeon'). A gens of the Chippewa. See Nameuilini.

Nā-mā.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 166, 1877. Namā.—Wm. Jones, infn. 1906. Namē.—Gatschet, Ojibwa MS., B. A. E., 1882. Numa.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 45, 1885.

Namabin (Nāmābin, 'sucker'). A gens of the Chippewa.

Nah-ma-bin.—Tanner, Narr., 315, 1830 (trans. 'carp'). Nām-a'-bin.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 166, 1877 (trans. 'carp'). Nāmābin.—Wm. Jones, infn. 1906 (sig. 'sucker'). Numa-bin.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 45, 1885 ('sucker').

Namakagon. A former village of the Munominkasheenhug division of the Chippewa at upper St Croix lake, w. Wisconsin.

Num-a quag-um.—Ramsey in Ind. Aff. Rep., 86, 1850.

Namann ('beaver'). A subphratry or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 42, 1896.

Namasket (from namaus 'fish', aki 'land,' et 'at.'—J. N. B. H.). A tribe or band formerly living in a village of the same name about the site of Middleboro, Mass. They were subordinate to the Wampanoag. The village was populous when first known, but the Indians rapidly decreased as the white settlements advanced. In 1794 there were still about 40. One family, named Mitchell, still resides (1907) near Middleboro and claim descent from King Philip. A member of this family wears a so-called Indian costume (see New England Mag., 392, Dec. 1905). (J. M. F. G. S.)

Lamasket.—Hinckley (1685) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., v, 133, 1861 (misprint). Namasacet.—Dee in Smith (1629), Va., II, 227, repr. 1819. Namaschet.—Mourt (1622) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., IX, 52, 1822. Namascheucks.—Mourt (1622), ibid., IX, 52, 1822. Namasket.—Dermer (1620), ibid. Namassachusett.—Records (1644), ibid., VII, 137, 1818. Namassakett.—Bradford (1650), ibid., 4th s., III, 103, 1856. Namassekett.—Cotton (1674), ibid., 1st s., I, 20, 1806. Nemascut.—Church (1716) quoted by Drake, Ind. Wars, 75, 1825. Nemasket.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 3, 9, 1848. Nummastaquyt.—Dermer (1619) quoted by Drake, ibid., bk. 2, 20.

Namassingakent. A village of the Powhatan confederacy existing in 1608 on the s. bank of the Potomac in Fairfax co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

(Na-ma-thū', 'turtle'). A Shawnee.—Morgan, Anc. 77.

b. One of the names of the (Salmo namaycush), Mackinac or great lake trout, called ine; from namekus, which in dialect of Algonquian signifies Chippewa word being namecus is a diminutive of namew, a word originated in N. W. Togwe. (A. F. C.)

from Nam-bé-é, the native probably referring to a round hill valley). A Tewa pueblo, about 16 m. N. of Santa Fé, on Nambe r., a small tributary of Grande. It became the seat of a mission early in the 17th century but was reduced to a visita of Santa Clara in 1782. Like Santa Clara and Abasco doubtless owes its decline to constant intertribal execution for vile practices of witchcraft (Bancroft, Arch. Inst. Pap., III, 35, 1890). 1890, 100 (est.) in 1904. The people claim to have once inhabited ruined pueblos of Agawano, Guayo, Kekwaii, Kopiwari, and Tegu. The Nambe clans, so far as known, are Cloud (Owbu), Birch (Nana),

NAMBE MAN (POTSHUNG)

Fire (Pa), Mountain Lion (Qen), Eagle (Tse), Bear (Ke), Tobacco (Sa), Sun (Tan, extinct), Calabash (Po), Ant (Kungyi), Earth (Nang), Grass (Ta). See Pueblos, Tewa. (F. W. H.)

Nambe.—Ward in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1867, 212, 1868.

Nambe.—Ward, Ibid., 1864, 191, 1865. Na-im-bai.—

NAMBE GIRL (PAB. A TAFOLLA)

Jouvencau in Cath. Pion., I, no. 9, 12, 1906. Na-imbe.—Bancroft in *Arch. Inst. Coll., 1st s., x, 101-103, 1809. Tōwawog.—Kendall, Trav., I, 292, 1809.

Namequa. The only daughter of Black Hawk (q. v.), regarded as one of the handsomest of the Sauk maidens of her time. A young Baltimorean of high social standing, being on a visit to Ft Madison, Iowa, became enamored of her and would have made her his wife but for the opposition of his friends. Namequa appears to have been ever faithful to her father's interests and to his memory, and after reaching maturer years, and even after her marriage, was a constant help to her mother, especially during her father's imprisonment and after his death in 1838. (C. T.)

Nameroughquena. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, in the present Alexandria co., Va., on the s. bank of the Potomac, opposite Washington, D. C.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Names and Naming. Among the Indians personal names were given and changed at the critical epochs of life, such as birth, puberty, the first war expedition, some notable feat, elevation to chieftainship, and, finally, retirement from active life was marked by the adoption of the name of one's son. In general, names may be divided into two classes: (1) True names, corresponding to our personal names, and (2) names which answer rather to our titles and honorary appellations. The former define or indicate the social group into which a man is born, whatever honor they entail being due to the accomplishments of ancestors, while the latter mark what the individual has done himself.

There are characteristic tribal differences in names, and where a clan system existed each clan had its own set of names, distinct from those of all other clans, and, in the majority of cases, referring to the totem animal, plant, or object. At the same time there were tribes in which names apparently had nothing to do with totems, and some such names were apt to occur in clans having totemic names. Most Siouan clans and bands had names that were applied in a definite order to the boys and girls born into them. A Mohave child born out of wedlock received some ancient name, not commonly employed in the tribe. Among the interior Salish, where there were no clans, names were usually inherited in both the male and female lines for several generations, though new names were continually introduced that were taken from dreams or noteworthy events. Loskiel records that a Delaware child was often named in accordance with some dream that had come to its father. According to Ross, a father among some of the northern Athapascan tribes lost his name as soon as a male child was born and was henceforth called after the name of his son; a Tlingehadinne changed his name after the birth of each successive child, while an unmarried man was known as the child of his favorite dog. Among the Maidu infants might be named with reference to some incident occurring at the time of birth, but many received no names other than such general appellations as 'child,' 'baby,' or 'boy,' until they were old enough to exhibit some characteristic which suggested something appropriate. The father and mother addressed a boy all his life by his boyhood name. A girl, however, received different successive names at puberty, childbirth, and in old age. The Kiowa, being without clans, received names suggested by some passing incident or to commemorate a warlike exploit of some ancestor. Sometimes, however, they were hereditary, and in any case they were bestowed by the grandparents to the exclusion of the parents. Young men as they grew up usually assumed dream names, in obedience to visions.

The naming of a rich man's child among the coast Salish was accompanied by a great feast and distribution of property, and an invited chief publicly announced the name given. Names even originally belonging to the higher class were bestowed upon young people among the Haida and Tlingit when their relatives had potlatches, and it thus resulted that names individually acquired became in time hereditary and were added to the list of common names owned by the clan.

The second name, or title, was sometimes, as has been said, bestowed on account of some brave or meritorious action. Thus a Pawnee "was permitted to take a new name only after the performance of an act indicative of great ability or strength of character," and it was done during a public ceremonial. Among the Siouan tribes a similar custom seems to have prevailed, but among the Maidu of California entrance into the secret society took its place as a reason for the bestowal of new titles. On the N. W. coast a man adopted one of the potlatch, or sacred, names of his predecessor when he gave the mortuary feast and erected the grave post. At every subsequent potlatch he was at liberty to adopt an additional title, either one used by his predecessor or a new one commemorative of an encounter with a supernatural being or of some success in war or feast-giving. Along with his place in a secret society a Kwakiutl obtained the right to certain sacred names which had been received by the first holder of his position from the spirit patron of the society and were used only during the season of the ceremonial, like the titles employed in the fraternal and other societies of civilized life. The second name among this people also marks individual excellence rather than the attainment of an hereditary position, for the person did not succeed to the office, but had to pass through a long period of training and labor to be accepted. After a man died his name was held in abeyance for a longer or shorter period, and if it were taken from the name of some familiar object, the name of that object often had to be altered, but the taboo period was not longer than would allow the person's successor to collect his property and give the death feast, and a simple phonetic change often satisfied all scruples. Changes of this kind seem to have been carried to greater extremes by some tribes, notably the Kiowa, where, on the death of any member of a family all the others take new names, while all the terms suggesting the name of the dead person are dropped from the language for a period of years. Among the coast Salish a single name was often used by successive chiefs for four or five generations. Among the Iroquois and cognate tribes, according to Hewitt, the official name of a chieftaincy is also the official name of the officer who may for the time being become installed in it, and the name of this chieftaincy is never changed, no matter how many persons may successively become incumbents of it. Unlike the Indians of most tribes, a Pueblo, although bearing several names, usually retained one name throughout life. In many tribes a curious custom prohibited a man from directly addressing his wife, his mother-in-law, and sometimes his father-in-law, and vice versa.

Names of men and women were usually, though not always, different. When not taken from the totem animal, they were often grandiloquent terms referring to the greatness and wealth of the bearer, or they might commemorate some special triumph of the family, while, as among the Navaho, nicknames referring to a personal characteristic were often used. The first name frequently refers to something which especially impressed the child's mother at the time of its birth. Often names were ironical and had to be interpreted in a manner directly opposite to the apparent sense. A failure to understand this, along with faulty interpretation, has brought about strange, sometimes ludicrous, misconceptions. Thus the name of a Dakota chief, translated 'Young-man-afraid-of-his-horses,' really signifies 'Young man whose very horses are feared.' Where the clan system did not flourish, as among the Salish, the name often indicated the object in nature in which a person's guardian spirit was supposed to dwell. Names for houses and canoes went by families and clans like personal names and property in general.

Names could often be loaned, pawned, or even given or thrown away outright; on the other hand, they might be adopted out of revenge without the consent of the owner. The possession of a name was everywhere jealously guarded, and it was considered discourteous or even insulting to address one directly by it. This reticence, on the part of some Indians at least, appears to have been due to the fact that every man, and every thing as well, was supposed to have a real name which so perfectly expressed his inmost nature as to be practically identical with him. This name might long remain unknown to all, even to its owner, but at some critical period in life it was confidentially revealed to him. It was largely on account of this sacred character that an Indian commonly refused to give his proper designation, or, when pressed for an answer, asked someone else to speak it. Among the Maidu it was not customary, in addressing a person, to use the name descriptive of his personal characteristics.

In modern times the problem of satisfactorily naming Indians for purposes of permanent record has been very puzzling owing to their custom of changing names and to the ignorance on the part of persons in authority of native customs and methods of reckoning descent. According to Mooney, Setimkia, 'Bear bearing down (an antagonist),' the honorable war name of a noted Kiowa chief, is mistranslated 'Stumbling Bear.' Tenepiabi, 'Bird coming into sight', has been popularly known as 'Hummingbird' since he was a prisoner in Florida in 1875, probably a mistake for 'Coming bird.' Hajo, a Creek war title signifying 'recklessly brave,' is popularly rendered 'crazy,' as in the case of Chito Hajo, leader of the Creek opposition to allotment, whose name is popularly and officially rendered 'Crazy Snake.' Even when translated correctly an Indian name often conveys an impression to a white man quite the reverse of the Indian connotation. Thus 'Stinking Saddle Blanket' (Takaibodal) might be considered an opprobrious epithet, whereas it is an honorary designation, meaning that the bearer of it, a Kiowa, was on the warpath so continuously that he did not have time to take off his saddle blanket. 'Unable-to-buy,' the name of a Haida chief, instead of indicating his poverty, commemorates an occasion when a rival chief did not have enough property to purchase a copper plate he offered for sale.

In recent years the Office of Indian Affairs has made an effort to systematize the names of some of the Indians for the purpose of facilitating land allotments, etc. By circular issued Dec. 1, 1902, the office set forth the following principles governing the recording of Indian names on agency rolls, etc.: (1) The father's name should be the family surname; (2) the Indian name, unless too long and clumsy, should be preferred to a translation; (3) a clumsy name may be arbitrarily shortened (by one familiar with the language) without losing its identity; (4) if the use of a translation seems necessary, or if a translation has come into such general and accepted use that it ought to be retained, that name should be written as one word.

Namontack. A trusted Powhatan Indian whom Powhatan gave to Capt. Newport in 1608 in return for the English boy, Thomas Savage, left with the former for the purpose of gaining knowledge of the language, manners, customs, and geography of tidewater Virginia. Namontack was of shrewd and subtle character, and proved of service to the English in preventing attack and in obtaining needed corn (Smith, Works, Arber ed., 128, 1884). He was subsequently sent to England, and on the way back, in 1610, was murdered in the Bermudas by an Indian companion.

Nampa image. A small human figure of baked clay, 1½ in. in height, apparently intended to represent a female. It is so much injured by exposure that the features are entirely destroyed and the hands and feet are missing. It derives its archeological interest from the fact that it is said to have been brought from a depth of 320 ft by an artesian well sand-pump, at Nampa, Idaho, in 1889. According to Emmons, the formations in which the pump was operating are of late Tertiary or early Quaternary age; and the apparent improbability of the occurrence of a well-modeled human figure in deposits of such great antiquity has led to grave doubt as to its authenticity. It is one of those discoveries which, on account of the importance of the problems involved, requires definitive verification. It is interesting to note that the age of this object, supposing it to be authentic, corresponds with that of the incipient man whose bones were recently recovered by Dubois from the late Tertiary or early Quaternary formations of Java, and it follows that the autochthonous American sculptor had produced this so Nanay, Nané). A subordinate warrior of the Chiricahua fighting their hostilities against the latter part of the 19th century was Victorio's associate until the latter in Mexico in 1880. He, with 15 warriors who had followed Victorio, Nana crossed the Rio Grande and made his way into New Mexico. He was joined by 25 Mescaleros. He made a rapid and bloody raid on the southern part of the territory, on herders and prospectors, killing them without mercy. The invaders were driven back to Mexico by the August of the same year. This was only the last serious raid made by a band who was now an old man. (Geronimo Campaign, 99, 1886) described as having "a strong face, with intelligence, courage, and energy, but with an under stratum of and vindictiveness. o. The demiurge of the cosmogonic traditions of the Algonquian world among the various peoples under unrelated names, based on the characteristic or dominant traits of this personage. Among these are Jamum, Kloskap (Gloskap), Mousou, Michabo, Minabozho, Misabos, Napiw, Nenabozho, Wieska, Wisakedjak, and their dialectic variants. The etymologies proposed for these several names are most probably incorrect, wholly or in material parts.

Nanabozho is apparently the impersonation of life, the active quickening power of life—of life manifested and embodied in the myriad forms of sentient and physical nature. He is therefore reputed to possess not only the power to live, but also the correlative power of renewing his own life and of quickening and therefore of creating life in others. He impersonates life in an unlimited series of diverse personalities which represent various phases and conditions of life, and the histories of the life and acts of these separate individualities form an entire cycle of traditions and myths which, when compared one with another, are sometimes apparently contradictory and incongruous, relating, as these stories do, to the unrelated objects and subjects in nature. The conception named Nanabozho exercises the diverse functions of many persons, and he likewise suffers their pains and needs. He is this life struggling with the many forms of want, misfortune, and death that come to the bodies and beings of nature.

The true character of the concept embodied in the personality called Nanabozho has been misconceived. Horatio Hale, for example, calls the Chippewa Nanabozho a fantastic deity, declaring him to have no relation to the Iroquois Te'horon'hiawa'k'ho', whereas he is in everything but minor details identical with the Iroquoian conception embodied in the latter personality. Few, if any, of the characteristic acts and functions of the one may not safely and correctly be predicated of the other, and it is a remarkable parallel if the one is not a concept borrowed by the people of one linguistic family from the thought of the other. If independent creations, they agree in so many points that it is more than probable that the one suggested the other. Even the play of popular interpretation and etymologic analysis have made like errors in the events connected with the life history of each. In the Iroquois legend the brother of Te'horon'hiawa'k'ho' is reputed to have been embodied in chert or flint, a statement based on a misconception arising from the common origin of some terms denotive of ice on the one hand and of chert on the other. A like error gave rise to the Chippewa name for chert or flint (miskwam), which signifies 'ice-stone,' and the connection between malsum, 'wolf,' and mā'haliq, 'a flint or chert,' also a name of Chakekenapok, the brother of Nanabozho. The confusion is that the ruler of winter, the ruler clothed in frost, ice, and snow, is identified with chert or flint, in Iroquois too, because of the identity of origin between the terms for crystal or sparkling ice and the smooth glistening surface of chert or flint.

In Potawatomi and cognate tradition Nanabozho is the eldest of male quadruplets, the beloved Chipiapoos being the second, Wabosbo the third, and Chakekenapok the fourth. They were begotten by a great primal being, who had come to earth, and were born of a reputed daughter of the children of men. Nanabozho was the professed and active friend of the human race. The mild and gentle but unfortunate Chipiapoos became the warder of the dead, the ruler of the country of the manes, after this transformation. Wabosbo ('Maker of White'), seeing the sunlight, went to the northland, where, assuming the form of a white hare, he is regarded as possessing most potent manito or orenda (q. v.). Lastly, Chakekenapok, named from chert, flint, or firestone (?fire), was the impersonation originally of winter, and in coming into the world ruthlessly caused the death of his mother.

Having attained the age of manhood, Nanabozho, still feeling deep resentment for the death of his mother, resolved to avenge it by the destruction of his brother Chakekenapok. The two brothers soon grappled with each other. Chakekenapok finally turned and fled, but Nanabozho pursued him over the world, finally overtaking and striking him with a deerhorn or a chert, fracturing or chipping pieces from various parts of his body, and destroying him by tearing out his entrails. The fragments from Chakekenapok's body became huge rocks, and the masses of flint or chert found in various parts of the world show where the conflicts between the two brothers took place, while his entrails became vines. Before the Indians knew the art of fire-making Nanabozho taught them the art of making hatchets, lances, and arrowpoints.

Nanabozho and Chipiapoos dwelt together in a land far removed from the haunts of mankind. They were noted for excellence of body and beneficence of mind, and for the supreme character of the magic power they possessed. These qualities and attributes excited the bitter antagonism of the evil manitos of the air, earth, and waters, who plotted to destroy these two brothers. Nanabozho, who was immune to the effects of adverse orenda and from whose knowledge nothing was barred, knew their snares and devices and hence eluded and avoided them. He, however, warned Chipiapoos, his less-gifted brother, not to leave their lodge or to separate from him even for a moment. But, disregarding this admonition, one day Chipiapoos ventured out of the lodge and went on the ice of a great lake, probably L. Michigan. This temerity was the opportunity sought by the manitos, who broke the ice, causing Chipiapoos to sink to the bottom of the lake, where his body was hidden by the manitos. Upon returning to the lodge, Nanabozho, missing Chipiapoos and surmising his fate, became inconsolable. Everywhere over the face of the earth he sought for him in vain. Then he became enraged and waged relentless war against all manitos, wreaking vengeance by precipitating a multitude of them into the abyss of the world. He next declared a truce in order to mourn for his brother, disfiguring his person and covering his head to indicate grief, bitterly weeping, and uttering from time to time the name of the lost and unhappy Chipiapoos. It is said Nanabozho secluded himself for six years in his lodge of mourning. During this truce the evil manitos, knowing the unlimited powers of Nanabozho and recollecting the destruction of the vast numbers of manitos by their metamorphosis to gratify his anger, consulted together to devise means for pacifying Nanabozho's wrath; but through fear of their great adversary their plans came to naught. At last four of the manitos, hoary with age and ripe in experience and wisdom, and who had not been parties to the death of Chipiapoos, undertook a mission of pacification. Having built a lodge of condolence near that of Nanabozho, they prepared a feast of welcome, filling with tobacco a pipe the stem of which was a calumet, and then silently and ceremoniously moved toward their antagonist. The four ambassadors severally carried a bag made from the entire skin of an otter, a lynx, a beaver, or of some other animal, which contained magically potent medicines and powerful fetishes. Arriving at the lodge of Nanabozho, they chanted to him with ceremonial formality their good intentions and kind greetings, and asked him to be pleased to accompany them to their lodge. Moved by these greetings, Nanabozho uncovered his head, and, arising, washed himself and then accompanied them. On his entering the lodge the manitos offered him a cup of purification medicine preparatory to his initiation into the Midé, or Grand Medicine Society. Nanabozho partook of the draft, and at once found himself completely freed from feelings of resentment and melancholy. Then the prescribed ritual was performed by the manitos. The proper dances and the chants of the Midé were chanted, and the four manitos, humanized primal beings, gently applied to Nanabozho their pindikosan, or magically potent medicine-bags, which, after ceremonially blowing their orenda or magic power into him, they cast on the ground. At every fall of the medicine-bags Nanabozho became aware that the melancholy, sadness, hatred, and anger that oppressed him gradually left, and that beneficent affection and feelings of joy arose in his heart. On the completion of his initiation he joined in the dances and in the chanting; then they all ate and smoked together, and Nanabozho expressed thanks to his hosts for initiating him into the mysteries of the grand medicine.

To further show their good will, the manitos, by the exercise of their magic powers, brought back the missing Chipiapoo, but, owing to his metamorphosis, he was forbidden to enter the lodge. Having received a lighted torch through a chink in the walls of the lodge, he was required to go to rule the country of the manes, where, with the lighted torch he carried, he should kindle a fire that should never be extinguished, for the pleasure of his uncles and aunts—namely, all men and women—who would repair thither. Subsequently, Nanabozho again descended upon the earth, and at once initiated all his family in the mysteries of the grand medicine. He provided each of them with a medicine-bag, well supplied with potent medicines, charms, and fetishes. He also strictly enjoined upon them the need of perpetuating the accompanying ceremonies among their descendants, explaining to them that these practices faithfully observed would cure their diseases, obtain for them abundance in fishing and hunting, and gain for them complete victory over their enemies.

Some hold to the doctrine that Nanabozho created the animals for the food and raiment of man; that he caused those plants and roots to grow whose virtues cure disease and enable the hunter to kill wild animals in order to drive away famine. These plants he confided to the watchful care of his grandmother, the great-grandmother of the human race, Mesakkummikokwi, and lest man should invoke her in vain she was strictly forbidden ever to leave her lodge. So, when collecting plants, roots, and herbs for their natural and magic virtues, an Algonquian Indian faithfully leaves on the ground hard by the place whence he has taken the root or plant a small offering to Mesakkummikokwi.

It is said that Nanabozho in his many journeys over the earth destroyed many ferocious monsters of land and water whose continued existence would have placed in jeopardy the fate of mankind. It is believed by the faithful that Nanabozho, resting from his toils, dwells on a great island of ice floating on a large sea in the northland, where the seraphim of auroral light keep nightly vigil. It is also believed that should he set foot on the land the world would at once take fire and every living being would share with it a common destruction. As a perversion of an earlier tradition, it is said that Nanabozho has placed four beneficent humanized beings, one at each of the four cardinal points or world-quarters, to aid in promoting the welfare of the human race—the one at the E. supplies light and starts the sun on his daily journey over the sky; the one at the S. supplies warmth, heat, and the refreshing dews that cause the growth of the soothing tobacco plant, and of corn, beans, squashes, and all the herbs and shrubs that bear fruit; the one at the W. supplies cooling and life-giving showers; lastly, the one at the N. supplies snow and ice, enabling the tracking and successful pursuit of wild animals, and who causes them to hibernate, to seek places of concealment from the cold of winter. Under the care of the man-being of the S. Nanabozho placed lesser humanized beings, dominantly bird-like in form, whose voices are the thunder and the flashing of whose eyes is the lightning, and to whom offerings of tobacco are made when their voices are loud and menacing.

Like the Iroquois and Huron sages, the Algonquian philosophers taught that the disembodied souls of the dead, on their journey to the great meadow in which is situated the village of their deceased ancestors, must cross a swift stream precariously bridged by a tree trunk, which was in continual motion. Over this the manes of the justified pass in safety, while the shades of the vicious, overcome by the magic power of adverse fate, fail at this ordeal, and, falling into the abyss below, are lost.

Another and equally credited tradition is to the effect that a manito or primal man-being formed a world which he peopled with man-beings having the form but not the benevolent attributes of man, and that these primal man-beings, doing nothing but evil, finally caused the destruction of the world and themselves by a flood; that having thus satisfied his displeasure the primal man being brought the world again out of the waters and formed anew a fine looking young man, but, being alone, the latter seemed disconsolate and weary of life. Then, pitying him, the primal man-being brought him as he slept a sister for a companion. Awakening, the young man was rejoiced to see his sister, and the two dwelt together for many years in mutual amusement and agreeable discourse. Finally the young man dreamed for the first time, and he related his dream to his sister, saying that it had been revealed to him that five young man-beings would that night visit their lodge, and that she was forbidden to speak to or in any manner recognize any of the first four who would seek admission to the lodge, but that she should welcome the fifth when he would seek admission. This advice she followed. After their metamorphosis these four primal young man-beings became respectively Sama or Tobacco, who, receiving no answer from the sister, died of chagrin; Wapekone or Squash; Eshketamok or Melon, and Kojees or Bean, who shared the fate of the first. But Mandamin or Corn, the fifth, was answered and welcomed by the sister, and he entered the lodge and became her husband. Then Mandamin buried his four comrades, and soon from their graves sprang up respectively tobacco, squashes, melons, and beans in such quantity as to supply them for the year, and tobacco enough to enable them to make offerings to the primal man-beings and to smoke in council. From this union sprang the Indian race.

In one version of the prevailing Algonquian cosmogonic story it is said that before the formation of the earth there was only water; that on the surface of this vast expanse of water floated a large raft on which were the animals of the various kinds which are on the earth and of which the Great Hare was the chief. They sought a fit and firm place on which to disembark; but as there were in sight only swans and other waterfowl, they began to lose hope, and, having no other, they requested the beaver to dive for the purpose of bringing up some earth from the bottom of the water, assuring him in the name of all the animals present that, should he return with only a single particle, it would produce an earth sufficiently spacious to contain and nourish all. But the beaver sought an excuse for refusal, saying that he had already dived around the raft and had failed to reach the bottom. He was pressed so strongly to make anew so worthy an attempt, however, that he took the hazard and dived. He remained without returning for so long a time that the supplicants believed him drowned. Finally they saw him appear nearly dead and motionless. Then all the animals, seeing that he was in no condition to remount the raft, at once interested themselves to take him into it. After examining carefully his paws and tail, they found nothing. But the little hope left them of being able to save their lives compelled them to address themselves to the otter to ask that he make an attempt to find earth at the bottom of the waters. It was told him that his own safety, as well as theirs, depended on the result of his effort. So the otter yielded to their urging and dived. He remained in the depths of the waters a longer time than did the beaver, but, like him, he came to the surface without success. The impossibility of finding a place to dwell where they could subsist left them nothing more to hope, when the muskrat offered to attempt to find the bottom, and he flattered himself that he would bring back sand. Although the beaver and the otter, much stronger than he, had not been able to accomplish the task, they encouraged him, promising even that, if he succeeded in his attempt, he should be the ruler of the whole world. The muskrat then cast himself into the waters and bravely dived into the depths. After remaining therein nearly an entire day and night he appeared motionless at the side of the raft, belly uppermost and paws closed. The other animals carefully took him out of the water, opened one of his paws, then a second, then a third, and finally the fourth, where there was a small grain of sand between his claws. The Great Hare, who was encouraged to form a vast and spacious earth, took this grain of sand and let it fall on the raft, which became larger. He took a part and scattered it, which caused the mass to increase more and more. When it was of the size of a mountain he willed it to turn, and as it turned the mass still increased in size. As soon as it appeared quite large he gave orders to the fox to examine his work with power to enlarge it. He obeyed. The fox, having learned that the earth was of such size that he could easily take his prey, returned to the Great Hare to inform him that the earth was large enough to contain and nourish all the animals. After this report the Great Hare went over his work, and, on going around it, found it imperfect. He has since not been disposed to trust any one of all the other animals, and ever keeps on enlarging the earth by ceaselessly going around it. The rumblings heard in the caverns of mountains confirm the Indians in the belief that the Great Hare continues the work of enlarging the earth. He is honored by them, and they regard him as the god who has formed the land.

Such is what the Algonquians teach regarding the formation of the earth, which they believe is borne on a raft. Concerning the sea and the firmament, they assert that they have existed for all time. After the formation of the earth all the other animals withdrew into the places most fitted to them, where they could feed and find their prey. The first of these having died, the Great Hare caused men to be born from their cadavers, even from those of the fish which were found along the banks of rivers which he had made in forming the earth, and gave each a different language or dialect. Because some ascribed their origin to the bear, others to the elk, and thus to all the different animals, they believed that they had their being from these creatures. (J. N. B. H.)

Nanicksah. One of the chiefs sent by the Ohio Shawnee in 1765 to negotiate a treaty of peace with Sir Wm. Johnson on behalf of the British government. The treaty was signed at Johnson Hall, N. Y., July 13, 1765.—N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 755, 1856.

Nanihaba (nanih 'hill,' aba 'above'). One of the 5 hamlets comprising the former Choctaw town of Imongalasha, in the present Neshoba co., Miss.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 432, 1902.

Nanikypusson. One of the chiefs sent by the Shawnee of Ohio in 1765 to negotiate a treaty of peace with Sir Wm. Johnson in behalf of the British government. The treaty was completed and signed at Johnson Hall, N. Y., July 13, 1765.—N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 755, 1856.

Nanipacna (Choctaw: 'high mountain'—Gatschet; 'hill top'—Halbert). An important town visited in 1559-60 by Tristan de Luna, by whom it was named Santa Cruz de Nanipacna; situated in s. Alabama, not far from Alabama r. Halbert (Gulf States Hist. Mag., ii, 130, 1903) thinks it was on the e. side of Alabama r. in the present Wilcox co., while Lowery (Spanish Settlements, 361, 1901) places it farther down the river, in Monroe co. It had been visited and partly destroyed by other white men, probably De Soto's expedition, some years before. (J. M.)

Nanipacna.—Barcia, Ensayo, 33, 1723. Napicnoca.—Fairbanks, Fla., 59, 1901 (misprint). Santa Cruz de Nanipacna.—Barcia, op. cit.

Nannehamgeh (Creek: nini 'trail', hamgin 'one': 'single trail'). The "old town" inhabited by the Natchez.—Adair, Am. Inds., 196, 1775.

Nanortalik. An Eskimo village on a small island in s. Greenland, lat. 60°.

Nannortalik.—Ausland, 162, 1886. Nanortalik.—Nansen, First Crossing, 307, 1890. Nennortalik.—Koldewey, German Arct. Exped., 182, 1874.

Nanpanta (Nan'panta, 'deer'). A Quapaw gens.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 229, 1897.

Nanpanta. A Deer gens: a division of the Washashewanun gens of the Osage.

Ke xa'tsu.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 234, 1897 ('Turtle with a serrated crest along the shell'). Nan'panta.—Ibid.

Nansattico. A former Matchotic village on Rappahannock r., s. w. of the present Hampstead, in King George co., Va.

Nansemond (from nansamend, 'one goes to fish,' or 'one (who) goes to fish (or fishing),' possibly originally a personal name.—Gerard). An important tribe of the Powhatan confederacy (q. v.) formerly occupying a territory on the s. side of lower James r., Va., within the present Nansemond and Norfolk cos., and having their principal town, "Nandeamund," probably about the present Chuckatuck in the former county. They were estimated by Capt. John Smith, in 1608, at 200 warriors, or perhaps a total population of 700 or 800. Like the other tribes of the confederacy they quickly declined after the advent of the whites, and in 1722, when they are mentioned in the Albany treaty with the Iroquois, they numbered, according to Beverley, only 150 in all. A scattered band of about 180 mixed-bloods, mostly truck farmers, still keep up the name near Bowershill, a few miles s. w. from Norfolk. (J. M.)

Nancymond.—Vassall (1667) in N. C. Col. Rec., I, 159, 1886. Nandsamunds.—Smith (1624), Va., 347, 1884. Nanemonds.—Albany conf. (1722) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Nantahala (Nān'dāyē'h ('middle [i. e. noonday] sun')). Originally the name of a point on Nantahala r. near Jarrett station, Macon co., N. C., where the cliffs are so perpendicular that the sun is not seen at their bases until noon; later applied to the neighboring Cherokee settlement of Briertown (q. v.).

Nantahala.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 528, 1900. Nantiyallee.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887. Nuntialla.—Mooney, op. cit.

Nantapoyac. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, situated on the s. bank of James r. in Surry co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Nantaughtacund. A tribe and village of the Powhatan confederacy, formerly s. of the Rappahannock, in Essex and Caroline cos., Va. In 1608 they numbered about 750.

Nandtaughtacund.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 37, 1849. Nantaughtacund.—Smith (1629), Va., I, 117, repr. 1819. Nantaucund.—Simons in Smith, ibid., 189. Naudtaughtacund.—Purchas, Pilgrimes, IV, map, 1716 (misprint). Nautaugtacunds.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 4, 9, 1848 (misprint).

Nanticoke (from Nentgo, var. of Delaware Unechtgo, Unalachtgo, 'tidewater people'). An important Algonquian tribe living on Nanticoke r. of Maryland, on the Smith in 1608 located their large, called Nanticoke. They differed linguistically and ethnically from the Delawares and the Conoy, showing the idiomatic variance of the latter. Their history is brief and affords but little tracing their movements in times. The 10th verse of Song of the Walam Olum is by Squier: "The Nentegoes (Delawares) went to the south although the Shawnee and they are brought together in this does not necessarily indicate separated from the main body at time and place; but in both separation appears to have occurred in the region that in verse 1, same designated Talega land, which is only in Ohio, since their tradition by Beatty (Brinton, Lenape 885) is precisely the same as Shawnee. It is also probable that the word 'Nanticoke' in the legend signifies some of the latitude of Pittsburg, Pa., of the Kanawha. A different probable account was given to me by the old chief, White, that, being great trappers and long separated from the Delawares, these had reached their eastward and wandered south in search of good trapping grounds.

Smith in 1660 informed the governor of Maryland of a "league that had lasted 13 generations with an emigrant Nanticoke lineage at its head, embraced all the tribes of the north and also the Potomac and, as added, even the Iroquoian Confederacy." (Maryland Arch., Proc. Council, 3). The Towogh of Smith, the later Doag, were possibly identical with the Nanticoke.

At a time after its settlement the colony found the Nanticoke a nuisance. As early as 1642 they were fully declared to be enemies, and until 1678 was the strife continuous. A renewal of hostilities occurred in 1687, but by prudent policy was prevented and terminated. In 1698, and from that time as long as they remained in the reservations were set aside for 1707 they had at least 7 villages. In 1722 their principal village, called by Beverley, contained 100 inhabitants and was the residence of "empress," who ruled over the neighboring Indians. At that time they numbered about 500. Soon they began to move north, stopping on the Susquehanna, north of the Juniata, and about 1748 the greater part of the tribe went up the Susquehanna, halting at various points, and finally settled under Iroquois protection at Chenango, Chugnut, and Owego, on the E. branch of the Susquehanna in N. New York. They were estimated at about 500 in 1765. A part remained in Maryland, where they were still living under the name of Wiwash in 1792, although reduced to about 30. In 1753 a part of those on the upper Susquehanna joined the Iroquois in N. New York, with whom they were still living in 1840, but the majority of the tribe, in company with remnants of the Mahican and Wappinger, emigrated to the W. about 1784 and joined the Delawares in Ohio and Indiana, with whom they soon became incorporated, disappearing as a distinct tribe. A few mixed bloods live on Indian reservations, Delaware.

The Nanticoke were distinguished from neighboring tribes by a darker color and peculiar customs. They appear to have been devoted to fishing and trapping as a means of subsistence. Heckewelder says: "They are said to have been the inventors of a poisonous substance by which they could destroy a whole settlement of people, and they are accused of being skilled in the arts of witchcraft. It is certain they are dreaded on this account. I have known Indians who firmly believed that they had people among them who could, if they pleased, destroy a whole army by merely blowing their breath toward them. Those of the Lenape and other tribes who pretend to witchcraft say that they learned the science from the Nanticokes." What particular characteristic, art, or knowledge caused them to be looked upon in this light is not stated; but it probably was their knowledge of poisons and the singular custom, which Heckewelder describes, of removing the bones of their dead from place to place during their various shiftings. They appear to have had a head chief, to whom the English, adopting Old World terms, applied the name emperor to distinguish him from the subordinate chiefs whom they called kings. The line of descent of the former was in the female line, and as noted above, if Beverley be correct, a woman might, under certain circumstances, hold the chieftaincy. Their towns appear to have been in some instances fortified, as Smith says: "They conducted us to their pallisadoed towne, mantelled with the barks of trees, with scaffolds like mounts, breasted about with breasts very formally."

The Nanticoke confederacy appears to have included, besides the Nanticoke proper, the Arseek, Cuscarawaoc, Nause, Ozinies (?), and Sarapinagh. The Nanticoke had at various times the following villages: Askimimkansen, Byengeahtein (mixed), Chenango (mixed), Locust Necktown, Matchcoughtin, Matcheattochousie, Nanduge, Natahquois, Pekoinoke, Pohecommeti, Teahquois, and Witichquaom. (J. M. C. T.)

Nanticoke. A sort of bean; from the name of an Algonquian tribe. Lawson (Hist. Carolina, 76, 1709) mentions nanticokes among "the pulse which we found the Indians possessed of when we settled in America." (A. F. C.)

Nantucket. When first settled by the whites this island, s. of the coast of Massachusetts, was occupied by two tribes whose names have not been preserved. One occupied the w. end of the island and was supposed to have come from the mainland by way of Marthas Vineyard; the other tribe lived at the e. end and was said to have come direct from the mainland. The two tribes were independent and were hostile to each other. They had several villages and numbered about 1,500 at the first settlement of the island in 1642 (Mayhew). In 1763 there were only 358 remaining and two-thirds of these died of a fever the next winter. In 1792 there were only 20 left, and these were reduced in 1809 to 2 or 3 persons of pure blood and a few of mixed race. The Indian names of different districts, which were probably the names of villages also, were Shimmoah (also a village), Tetaukimmo, Shaukimmo, Quayz, Podpis, Squam, Sasacacheh, and Siasconsit, and the village Miacomet (Notes on Nantucket (1807) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., iii, 25-26, 1815). For information concerning the early grants and conveyances of Nantucket lands, see Bull. Nantucket Hist. Assn., i, 1896-1902. (J. M.)

Nantuxet. A division of the Unami branch of the Delawares formerly living in Pennsylvania and Delaware.—Macaulay, N. Y., ii, 166, 1829.

Nanualikmut ('lake people': Kodiak name). A division of the Knaiakhotana of Cook inlet, Alaska.

Na-nua-li'-q'müt.—Hoffman, MS., B. A. E., 1882 ('people around the lake': Chugachigmiut name). Na-nu'-a-lúk'.—Ibid. ('lake people': Kaniagmiut name).

Nanumpum. See Weetamo.

Nanuntenoo. A sachem of the Narraganset, son of Miantonomo, called also Canonchet or Quananchit. He was the first signer of the treaty of Oct. 1675, but supplied the strength of the Narraganset war against the English, his young men having long secretly supported Philip. He escaped with his life from the fight of Dec. 1675, and in Mar. 1676 defeated the English under Capt. Peirse; but in April of that year he was surprised by an English force and surrendered. He was taken to Stonington, Conn., and was shot by representatives of his allied enemies under the eyes of the English. His head was sent as a trophy to the magistrates of Hartford (De Forest, Inds. of Conn., 282, 1852). Nanuntenu was tall and strongly built, and was a man of courage and ability. His fame at times was hardly less than that of King Philip. Some of his sayings have been preserved. (A. F. C.)

Nanussusuk (Nēnuswisowūgt, 'they go by the name of the buffalo.'—W. J.). A gens of the Sauk and Foxes.

Na-nus-sus'-so-uk.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 170, 1877.
Nēnuswisowūgt.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906.

Nanvogaloklak. A Magemiut village on one of the lakes connected with Kvichivak r., Alaska; pop. 100 in 1880.

Nanvogalekhlagamute.—Nelson (1879) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 454, 1906 (mute = 'people'). Nanvogaloklak.—Baker, ibid. Nanvogalekhlagamute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884 (misprint). Nanvogalekhlagamute.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 54, 1881 (misprint).

Nanyaayi (perhaps 'people of Nanya'). The most important social group among the southern Tlingit. They belong to the Wolf clan, have their winter town at Wrangell, and camp in summer along Stikine r. in Alaska. Ketgohittan and Kutshittan are given as divisions.

Na-nu-as-ghu.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859.

Nanykypasson. See Nanikypasson.

Nanzwaspe ('quiet heart'). The principal settlement of the Osage formerly in Neosho valley, s. e. Kans. According to De Smet its inhabitants numbered 600 in 1850.

Nān'zso wāspe.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1893. Nān'zso wāspe.—Ibid. Nanze-Waspe.—De Smet, W. Missions, 355, 1856.

Naogeh ('deer'). A clan of the Seneca. Canadashé.—French writer (1666) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 47, 1855. Nāo'-geh.—Morgan, League Iroq., 46, 80, 1861 (Seneca form).

Napa. A name of doubtful Indian origin, now used to designate a county, a town, a river, and a creek in California. So far as can be learned it was not used as a village name by either the Wintun or the Yukiian Wappo, the territories of both of which peoples embrace parts of Napa co., the boundary between them passing just s. of Napa City. Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 218, 1877) lists it as a Patwin tribe. (S. A. B.)

Napai. A mixed Athapaskan and Kuskwogmiut village on the n. bank of Kuskokwim r., a little above Kolmakof, Alaska; pop. 23 in 1890.

Napaimute.—Hallock in Nat. Geog. Mag., ix, 91, 1896.

Napai. A Nushagagmiut Eskimo village in the Nushagak district, Alaska; pop. 11 in 1890.

Napaimiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893 (Eskimo name for the people).

Napaishak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the left bank of Kuskokwim r., about 4 m. below Bethel, Alaska; pop. 196 in 1880, 97 in 1890.

Napaishakgamut.—Kilbuck quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Napashagamiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893. Napashagamiute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 17, 1884.

Napakiak. A Kuskwogmiut village on the right bank of Kuskokwim r., about 10 m. below Bethel, Alaska; pop. 98 in 1880.

Napachikachagamut.—Kilbuck quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 454, 1906. Napahaiagamut.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 23, map, 1899. Napahaiagamute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 17, 1884. Napahayagamiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 104, 1893. Napahayagamiute.—Petroff, Resources of Alaska, 53, 1881.

Napaklulik. A Malemiut Eskimo village on Mangoak r., Alaska, s. e. of Selawik lake, about lat. 66° 20', lon. 160° 20'.

Napakutak. An Eskimo village on an island variously called Ettyhren, Ipekut, and Chirluk, off the n. e. coast of Siberia. Pop. 52 in 5 houses about 1895; 37 in 4 houses in 1901.

Napa'kutak.—Bogoms, Chukchee, 29, 1904 (Eskimo name). Nepe'kuten.—Ibid. (Chukchee name).

Napeshneeduta ('Red man who flees not'). A Mdewakanton Sioux, the first full-blood Dakota man to be baptized and received into a Christian church. He was a son of the sister of Mrs Renville, wife of Joseph Renville the trader, and claimed kindred with some of the principal chiefs of the Mdewakanton. He is described as having been above the average height, well formed, and with a countenance indicative of intelligence, kindness, and honesty. He was baptized at Lac-qui-Parle, Minn., Feb. 21, 1840, receiving the name Joseph Napeshnee; his wife was received into the church at the same time, and he brought four children to be baptized, three of them by former wives. His wife died within 5 years, when he married a convert, Pretty Rainbow, who deserted him; he later married another Christian woman and removed to Little Crow's Village, a few miles below Ft Snelling, on the Mississippi, where many of his relatives lived. Here he became ill with fever, and because of his change of religious faith his people refused him food and help. When the outbreak of the Sioux began in 1862, Joseph, like the other Christian Indians, befriended the whites, and in the following spring he was engaged as a Government scout, a position which he held for several years, returning finally to Lac-qui-Parle where he died in July 1870. In his last years Joseph was respected for his piety and industry by both whites and Indians. For nearly 10 years he was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church, and supported his family, notwithstanding the infirmities of old age, without Government aid. See Williamson in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 188, 1880.

Napetaca. A village of the Yustaga tribe or "province" in Florida, the scene of one of the fiercest battles between the Indians and De Soto's troops in 1539. It was probably on one of the head-streams of Suwannee r. (J. M.)

Napetaca.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) quoted by Bourne, De Soto Narr., I, 41, 1904. Napetuca.—Gentl. of Elvas in Hakluyt Soc. Pub., IX, 39, 1851. Napituca.—Ranjel (ca. 1546) in Bourne, op. cit., II, 73, 1904.

Napeut. A former Pima rancheria on the N. bank of the Rio Gila, s. Ariz.; visited by Father Garcés in 1770.

Napeut.—Arricivita, Crónica, II, 416, 1792.

Napissa (Choctaw: nanpisa, 'spy,' 'sentinel'). A tribe mentioned in 1699 by Iberville as united with the Chickasaw, living in villages adjoining those of the latter, and speaking the same or a cognate language. As they disappear from history early in the 18th century, it is probable that they were absorbed by the Chickasaw, if indeed they were not a local division of the latter. (A. S. G.)

Napissa.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., IV, 184, 1880. Napyasa.—Ibid., 164. Napysas.—Ibid., 180.

Napiw. See Nanabozho.

Napobatin. A name said by Gibbs (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 110, 1853) to signify 'many houses,' and to have been used by the Indians of Big valley, on the s. shore of the main body of Clear lake, for themselves collectively. This is doubtful. (S. A. B.)

Napochies. A tribe living near Coosa r., Ala., at war with the Coças (Creeks) in 1560. They were probably a Muskhogean people, more nearly affiliated to the modern Choctaw. Cf. Napissa.

Napaches.—Fairbanks, Hist. Fla., 86, 1871. Napochies.—Barcia, Ensayo, 35-37, 1723.

Napoya. A clan of the Apohola phratry of the Timucua of Florida.—Pareja (ca. 1612) quoted by Gatschet in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., XVII, 492, 1878.

Nappeckamak ('enclosed or occupied water-place'). The principal village of the Manhattan, on the site of Yonkers, N. Y.

Nappeckamaks.—Bolton quoted by Rutenber, Tribes Hudson's R., 77, 1872. Nappikomack.—Rutenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 23, 1906. Nepahkomuk.—Ibid.

Napúchi ('mountain pass'). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Naquiscoça. An unidentified town visited by Moscoso's troops in 1542, w. of Mississippi r.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 199, 1850.

Narajerachic ('where the dead are dancing'). A burial cave of the Tarahumare in the Arroyo de las Iglesias, on the road from Batopilas to Carichic, in s. w. Chihuahua, Mexico. It has been much despoiled in recent years on account of mining the saltpeter deposits in the cave, in conducting which about a hundred bodies were uncovered.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 222, 1902.

Nararachic (probably 'place of tears,' or 'weeping place'). Formerly a large pueblo of the Tarahumare, but now an unimportant settlement about 15 m. N. of Norogachic, lat. 27° 40', lon. 107°, Chihuahua, Mexico. With the neighboring ranches the population numbered about 180 families in 1902.

Narrarachic.—Lumholtz in Scribner's Mag., XVI, 311, Sept. 1894 (misprint). Nararachic.—Lumholtz in Internat. Cong. Anthropol., 102, 1894.

Naraticon. A division of the Delawares of s. New Jersey. They have been variously located by writers, but according to Brinton lived on Raccoon cr.

Nattikongy.—De Laet (1633) in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., I, 315, 1841. Naratekona.—De Laet (1633), ibid., 303. Naraticona.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 42, 1885. Naricon.—Doc. of 1656 in N. Hist., XII, 61, 1877. Narratikonok.—Herrman map, 1670. Narriticonga.—Macaulay, N. Y., II, 164, 1829.

Narices. A tribe, probably Coahuiltecan or Tamaulipan, at Reinoso, Mexico, near the Rio Grande, below Laredo, Texas, in 1757. They were with the Nazas, Comecrudos, and Tejones. The Narices and the Nazas had been converted at Villa de Pilon, in Nueva Leon (Joseph Tienda de Cuervo, Informe del Reconocimiento e Ynspección de la Colonia de el Seno Mexicano, 1757, MS. in the Archivo General, Historia, LVI; Orozco y Berra, Geog., 294, 1864). (H. E. B.)

Narises.—Tienda de Cuervo, op. cit., 1757.

Nariz (probably Spanish 'nose'). A Papago village, probably in Pima co., s. Ariz.; pop. about 250 in 1863.

Naris.—Browne, Apache Country, 291, 1869 (misquoting Poston). Nariz.—Poston in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1863, 385, 1864.

Narraganset ('people of the small point,' from naiagans, diminutive of naiag, 'small point of land,' with locative ending -et). An Algonquian tribe, formerly one of the leading tribes of New England. They occupied Rhode Island w. of Narragansett bay, including the Niantic territory, from Providence r. on the N. E. to Pawcatuck r. on the s. w. On the N. w. they claimed control over a part of the country of the Coweset and Nipmuc, and on the s. w. they claimed by conquest from the Pequot a strip extending to the Connecticut line. They also owned most of the islands in the bay, some of which had been conquered from the Wampanoag. The Niantic, living in the western part of the country, were a subordinate tribe who became merged with the Narraganset after King Philip's war. The Narraganset escaped the great pestilence that in 1617 desolated the southern New England coast, and, being joined by numbers of the fugitives from the E., became a strong tribe. The early estimates, as usual, greatly exaggerate, but it is certain that they numbered, including their dependents, several thousand when first known to the whites. In 1633 they lost 700 by smallpox, but in 1674 they still numbered about 5,000. The next year saw the outbreak of King Philip's war, which involved all the neighboring tribes and resulted in the destruction of the Indian power in southern New England. The Narraganset threw their whole strength into the contest and shared the common fate. In the celebrated swamp fight near Kingston, R. I., on Dec. 19, 1675, they lost nearly 1,000 in killed and prisoners, and soon thereafter the survivors were forced to abandon their country and take refuge in small bands among the interior tribes in the N. and W. It is probable that most of them joined the Mahican and Abnaki, though some may have found their way to Canada. In 1682 a party of about 100 fugitives at Albany asked permission to return in peace. The Niantic had taken no part in the war against the whites, and in this way preserved their tribal organization and territory. The scattered Narraganset, as they surrendered, were settled among them, and the whole body henceforth took the name of Narraganset. They were assigned a tract near Charlestown, R. I., and constantly decreased in numbers, as they were hemmed in by the whites. Many of them joined the Brotherton Indians in New York in 1788. Those who remained numbered about 140 in 1812, and 80 in 1832, but these are now reduced to a few individuals of mixed Indian and negro blood, some of whom have joined the Mohegan near Norwich, Conn.

The Narraganset were ruled by eight chiefs, each of whom had his own particular territory, but was subject to the head chief, who lived at their principal village, called Narraganset, about the site of Kingston. Of the religion of the aborigines of Rhode Island, Roger Williams wrote, Feb. 28, 1638 (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., vi, 225, 1863) as follows: "They have plenty of Gods or divine powers: the Sunn, Moone, Fire, Water, Earth, the Deere, the Beare, &c. I brought home lately from the Nanhiggonicks the names of 38 of their Gods, all they could remember." Denison says: "They made no images; their divinities were ghosts; they were extreme spiritualists. Every element and material and object had its ruling spirit, called a god, or Manitou. These divinities seemed ever passionate and engaged in war with each other; hence the passionate and warlike character of the worshippers. They adored not intelligence and virtue, but power and revenge. Every person was believed to be under the influence of some spirit, good or evil—that is, weak or strong—to further the person's desires. These spirits, or Manitous, inhabited different material forms, or dwelt at times in them. The symbolic signature employed by sachems and chiefs, in signing deeds, represented, in many cases, the forms inhabited by their guardian or inspiring spirits; these were bows, arrows, birds, fishes, beasts, reptiles, and the like."

The following were the Narraganset and Niantic villages: Charlestown, Chaubatick, Maushapogue, Mittaubecut, Narraganset, Niantic, Pawchauquet, and Shawomet.

Nascapee (a term of reproach applied by the Montagnais). The most northeasterly of the Algonquian tribes, occupying the elevated interior of Quebec and Labrador penin. s. of the Gulf of St Lawrence and extending from the vicinity of
L. Mistassini to Ungava bay on the n.
They call themselves Nanénot, 'true, real men.' Many of them have intermarried with their congeners the Montagnais, and when they visit the coast the two tribes frequent the same stations.
When in the neighborhood of Ungava bay they are known as Ungava Indians.
They are shorter and of lighter build than the Montagnais, and have delicately formed and clear-cut features, small hands and feet, and large, rather soft, eyes.

According to their traditions the Nas-capee were driven into their present in early times by the Iroquois. They assert that originally they lived in the north-west, N. of a great river (supposed to be the St. Lawrence) and toward the west lay an enormous body of water (supposed to be Hudson bay). When they reached the Ungava region their neighbors were Eskimo, who occupied the coast strip and with whom they were involved in war, which continued after the arrival of the whites. The Nascapees are now on terms of intimacy. The Nascapees do not have the endurance of Eskimo neighbors against fatigue and hunger, although equally able to stand the rigors of their harsh climate.

The children are obedient; disobedience toward their elders is unknown, and in their dealings one with another there is no quarreling. The Nascapees are generally healthy; their prevailing diseases are of the lungs and bowels—the former arising from exposure to the extremes of heat and cold and their insanitary habits; the latter due to their gluttony and long fasting from scarcity of food. Those who go to the coast to reside, as they have in recent years, appear to be more subject to diseases than those in the interior. Medical treatment consists of charms and incantations and the use of herbs and liniments, both native and procured from traders. Marriage is effected without ceremony and is conditioned on the consent of the father of the young woman and the father of the prospective husband to give her a wife; after marriage the bond is severed by either party on slight provocation. Polygamy is common, the number of wives a man may have being limited only by his means of supporting them. The sexual relations of the Nascapees are very loose; but their immorality is confined to their own people. Division of labor is similar to that of most tribes: the women perform domestic work, including the transportation of game, fetching the fuel, making the tipis, hauling the sleds when traveling, etc.; the men are the providers. They reach puberty at 14 or 15 years, and marry as wives at even an earlier age. Men usually do not bear more than 4 children; twins are rare.

The Nascapees suspend the bodies of the dead from branches of trees if the weather is much frozen, and endeavor to bury them when the weather is warm to bury them. Interment, however, has been introduced only since the advent of missionaries. A man of distinction is often buried at once, after a fire has been built over the body to thaw the earth. They have no horror for the dead, having been told, it is said, to rob Eskimo corpses of their clothing and accompanying implements.

Like other Indians the Nascapees believe that every object, animate or inanimate, is possessed of a form of spirit which, in order that it may perform its services for the welfare of the people, must be propitiated with acceptable offerings. The medicine-men are supposed to be in direct contact with all forms of spirits, and are consulted when it is desired to overcome their baneful influence by means of the shaman's art.

The subsistence of the Nascapees is gained by the chase, which is engaged in chiefly during the winter. In the spring men, women, and children repair to the trading posts, chiefly Ft. Chimo, where they trade furs, ptarmigan feathers, etc., for the articles and products of civilization. The reindeer forms the chief source of their food and clothing, although fish, ptarmigan, ducks, geese, hares, rabbits, porcupines, beaver, and, in seasons of hunger, an occasional lynx, are also eaten; the eggs of wild fowl are consumed in enormous quantities and in all stages of incubation. Reindeer are speared from canoes while crossing a stream, or snared or shot from ambush while passing through a narrow defile, or, in winter, are driven into a snowbank and speared. In these slaughtering operations an incredible number of carcasses and skins are left to decay. Wolverines, wolves, and foxes are never eaten. The flesh of game animals is dried, pounded, made into pemmican, and stored in baskets and bags for future use.

The apparel of the Nascapees is quite distinct for the two sexes; the clothing varies also with the season, as the extremes of climate are very great. That of the men consists of tanned reindeer coat, breeches, leggings, moccasins, gloves or mittens, and cap or headdress. Seams are sewed with sinew, and all the garments except the leggings, which are mostly hidden by the long coat, are ornamented with extravagant painted designs. Moccasins are rarely ornamented, except with beads or with strips of colored cloth. Beaded head-bands are used for bearing burdens, especially for carrying canoes when making portages. In winter the men wear the coat with the fur side inward and with a hood attached. In summer the women wear calico dresses, thin shawls obtained through trade, and moccasins; in winter their apparel consists of a reindeer skin robe, a sleeveless gown reaching a little below the knees, often highly ornamented with painted designs, beadwork, and fringe; and blanket shawl, shoulder cape, leggings, moccasins, and cap.

The dwellings, for both winter and summer, are tents or tipis of reindeer skins sewed together, and measuring 10 to 18 ft at the base and 10 to 14 ft high. The floor is carpeted with young spruce branches, except around the central fireplace; the smoke escapes through an opening in the top of the tipi where the supporting poles are brought together. The place of honor is the side opposite the fire. Poles extend across the tipi for the suspension of pots and kettles, and hunting apparatus, clothing, etc. are hung in convenient places. The outer edge of the interior is slightly raised above the center of the floor, affording a slope for the occupants when sleeping with their feet toward the fire. Sweat lodges of small poles covered with tent skins are in common use, and are heated, as usual, by means of hot stones on which water is poured. The domestic utensils of the Nascapée consist of thin vessels of spruce or birch, of various sizes, for holding liquids and for use as drinking cups; berry dishes or baskets of birchbark, sewed like the wooden vessels with split roots; baskets of birchbark with buckskin top and draw-string; bags made of the skins of reindeer legs sewed together; and spoons or ladles of wood nicely carved. They are inordinately fond of smoking, chewing, and snuffing tobacco—the latter, however, is practised only among the aged, especially the women. When camped at the trading posts the Indians boil together tobacco and molasses, to which water is added; this compound is drunk until stupefaction ensues. Pipes are made usually of sandstone or slate, with stem of spruce, often ornamented with beadwork, and are valued according to the color of the stone. Transportation and traveling are conducted by means of canoes made of slats or ribs covered with birchbark, sleds or toboggans (ti-bus-kîn), and snowshoes of four styles framed with wood and netted. Bows and arrows are now almost discarded for guns; but blunt-pointed arrows are still used for killing small game, and by boys. The reindeer spears, already referred to, consist of a shaft 6 ft long with a steel head made from a flat tile. Reindeer snares are made of reindeer parchment cut into thin narrow thongs and plaited, or of tanned skin. Beaver are sometimes trapped in a sort of net. Knives, awls, ice scoops and picks, hair combs and comb cases, porcupine tails for cleaning the combs, and fishing tackle are among the necessary implements of every Nascapée household.

The chief amusements of the men are games of draughts or checkers, of which they are exceedingly fond, and cup-and-ball. Feasts, accompanied by dance and ceremony, may be given by a man who has been unusually successful in hunting. Drums and drum-like rattles are used for musical accompaniments in their ceremonies; other rattles, as well as bows and arrows, which are shot at effigy targets, are used by the boys, while elaborately costumed dolls are made for the girls. Like other tribes the Nascapée have an abundance of folktales, the chief subject of which are the animals common to their environment. In these tales the wolverene seems to play a prominent part. (See Turner in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 267 et seq., 1894.)

On account of their wandering habits, the nature of their country, and their mixture with the Montagnais, it is impossible to give an exact statement of their numbers. In 1858 they were estimated at about 2,500. In 1884 the Nascapée of the lower St. Lawrence were officially reported to number 2,860, and the Indians of Labrador and E. Ruperts Land were returned as 5,016. In 1906 there were 2,183 Montagnais and Nascapée officially noted as such, and 2,741 unnamed Indians in the interior, 1,253 of whom were in the unorganized territories of Chicoutimi and Saguenay. See Montagnais, Nitchiquon.

Nasheakusk ('Loud Thunder'; also spelled Nashashuk, Nasheshuk, Nasueskuk, Nasheaskusk, Nasheescuek, etc.). The son of Black Hawk and his wife Asshawequa ('Singing Bird'). He was the eldest of Black Hawk's three children, the others being Nasonsee or Gamesett, a son, and Namequa, a daughter, who were living at the close of the Black Hawk war in 1832. Nasheakusk did not bear a conspicuous part in the Indian history of the N. W., being of note chiefly from his association with his famous father. He was born probably about the close of the 18th century. He remained with and followed the fortunes of his father not only during the war of 1832, but also during his captivity, and seems also to have lived with his father's family until the latter's death, Oct. 3, 1838, subsequently remaining with his mother for some years, probably until her death, Aug. 29, 1846. Nasheakusk and his brother made complaint to Gov. Lucas of Iowa when their father's grave was desecrated, which resulted in the recovery of the bones. The time of his death is not given. A portrait, painted by Samuel M. Brookes while Nasheakusk and his father were prisoners of war at Fortress Monroe, Va., is in possession of the Historical Society of Wisconsin (see illustration). (C. T.)

Nashobah. A former village of Christian Indians in the Nipmuc country, near Massog pond, in Littleton, Mass. Of it John Eliot wrote in 1670: "This place lying in the road-way which the Maquasogs [Mohawk] haunted, was much molested by them, and was one year wholly deserted, but this year the people have taken courage, and dwell upon it again." In 1675 the inhabitants, numbering about 50, were removed to Concord, Mass., on account of King Philip's war.

Nashua ('the land between'). A tribe formerly living on upper Nashua r., in Worcester co., Mass., said by some to have been connected with the Massachusetts, but classed by Potter with the Pennacook. They had a village called Nashua near the present Leominster, but their principal village seems to have been Weshacum, a few miles farther s. The Nashua tract extended for several miles in every direction around Lancaster. On the outbreak of King Philip's war, in 1675, they joined the hostile Indians, and, numbering several hundred, attempted to escape at his death in two bodies to the e. and w. Both parties were pursued and a large number were killed and captured, the prisoners being afterward sold into slavery. A few who escaped eastward joined the Pennacook, while about 200 of the others crossed the Hudson to the Mahican or the Munsee, and ceased to exist as a separate tribe. A few still remained near their old homes in 1701. (J. M.)

Nasomsee. See Nasheakusk.

Nasoni. A former tribe of the Caddo confederacy. Their principal village from 1687 to 1752, and probably later, was about 27 m. n. of Nacogdoches, on or near an eastern branch of Angelina r., N. E. Texas. They are possibly identical with the Nisone of the De Soto narrative of Biedma. They are mentioned by Joutel in 1687 and by La Harpe in 1719. The Spanish mission of San José de los Nazonos was established among them in 1716, east of upper Angelina r., but was transferred to San Antonio r. in 1731. Being upon the contested Spanish-French border ground they suffered accordingly from disease. They are mentioned in the Texas census of 1790, but seem to have disappeared as a distinct tribe about the end of the century. In customs and religion they resembled their kindred of the Caddo confederacy.

Nassauaketon ('forked river'). One of the four Ottawa divisions, living toward the close of the 17th century in s. Michigan or Wisconsin on a river n. of Green bay. They were so called from the fact that they resided then or previous to leaving Canada on a river having three branches. See Nagaonichirinimek.

Nasskatulok. Given by Krause as a Yuit Eskimo village at the head of Plover bay, Siberia (Deutsche Geog. Blätt., V, 80, map, 1882), but it is not mentioned by Bogoras.

Nastedi ('people of Nass'). A division of the Wolf phratry of the Tlingit, living at Kuiu, Alaska. They are said to have come from Nass r., whence the name.

Nas-tédi.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 120, 1885.

Nasto-kegawai (Nastō' qē'gawa-i, 'those born at Nasto [Hippa] id.'). A branch of the Skwahlladas, one of the most important families of the Raven clan of the Haida, living on the w. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905.

Nasueskuk.—See Nasheakusk.

Nasumi. A former Kusan village or tribe on the s. side of the mouth of Coquille r., on the coast of Oregon, near the site of the present town of Bandon.

Coquille.—Abbott, MS. Coquille census, B. A. E., 1858. Lower Coquille.—Dorsey, Naltūnnētūnnē MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Masonah.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Na'-cu-mi' jūnnē.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 231, 1890 (Tututni name). Nas-ah-mah.—Kautz, MS. Census of 1854, B. A. E., 1855. Nas-o-mah.—Parrish in Ind. Natahquois. A Nanticoke village in 1707, probably on the E. shore of Maryland or on the lower Susquehanna.—Evans (1707) quoted by Day, Penn., 391, 1843. The name is probably only a variant of Nanticoke.

Nataini ('mescal people'). A division of the Mescalero Apache who claim the country of the present Mescalero res., N. Mex., as their former home.

Nata-hinde.—Mooney, field notes, B. A. E., 1897.

Nata-i'ni.—Ibid.

Natal rites. See Child-life.

Natalsemoch. Given by Kane as the name of a tribe in Smith inlet, Brit. Col. It can not be identified with that of any tribe in this region, but it may have been applied to a part of the Goasila who also live on Smith inlet.

Natal se moch.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, V, 488, 1855. Nalatsenoch.—Seouler (1846) in Jour. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., I, 233, 1848. Natal-se-moch.—Kane, Wand. in N. Am., app., 1859.

Nataotin. A Takulli tribe living on middle Babine r. and Babine lake, Brit. Col. Dawson gave their number as about 300 in 1881. Morice (Notes on W. Denes, 27, 1892) said that they were in 3 villages on the s. half of Babine lake and numbered 310. They are the people formerly known as Babines, but Morice gave that name also to the Ilwot-sotenne, as there is perfect community of language, and both tribes wear labrets. In 1906 the two bands at Ft Babine and at the old fort numbered 283. The names of their villages are Lathakrezla and Neskollek.

Babinas.—Domenech, Deserts of N. Am., I, 440, 1860. Babine Indians.—Hale, Ethnog. and Philol.,

Col. map. Naotetains.—Prichard, Phys. Hist., v, 377, 1847. Nataotin.—Anderson quoted by Gibbs in Hist. Mag., VII, 76, 1863. Na-taw-tin.—Dawson in Geol. Surv. Can. 1879-80, 30B, 1881. Nâte-ote-tains.—Harmon, Jour., 203, 1820. Natotin Tiné.—Am. Nat., XII, 484, 1878. Na-te-utonne.—A. G. Morice, inf'n, 1890. Ntauo-tin.—Latham in Trans. Philol. Soc. Lond., 66, 1856.

Natarghiliitunne ('people at the big dam'). A former village of the Mishikhwutinetunne on Coquille r., Oreg.

Na'-ta-rxi'-li-i' jûnné'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890. Nato'-l'i'-âte tène'.—Everette, Tutu MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883 (trans. 'people near the waterfall').

Natashquan. A Montagnais rendezvous, visited also by the Nascapée, at the mouth of Natashquan r., on the N. shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Quebec. It contained 76 people in 1906.

Natashquan.—Hind, Lab. Penin., II, map, 1863. Natashquan.—Ibid., 180.

Natasi. A former village on Red r. of Louisiana, occupied by one of the tribes of the Caddo confederacy. In 1882 a Caddo Indian gave the Natasi as a division of the Caddo confederacy (Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 43, 1884), but as the name does not appear in the revised list of these divisions in 1891 (Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1092, 1896) it may be merely a subdivision of the Nabadache. Tonti in 1690 mentioned the villages of the "Nadas" as N. W. of the Natchitoch and near the Yatasi; he also speaks of the Nadouc villages as 12 leagues from Red r. In both instances he probably referred to the same people whose village Iberville learned of in 1699, the name of which was given by his Taensa Indian guide as Nataché. La Harpe in 1719 speaks of the same people by the name Nadassa, saying they were a small nation on Red r. Although the villages of the Natasi lay within the area that was in dispute by the Spaniards, French, and Americans during the 18th and the first half of the 19th centuries, the name of the people is hardly mentioned. Nothing is known of them as a tribe; they had probably mingled with their kindred, whose fate they shared, and if any survive they are now with the Caddo on their reservation in Oklahoma.

(A. C. F.)

Nadas.—Tonti (1690) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 72, 1846. Nadassa.—La Harpe (1719), ibid., III, 19, 1851. Nadouc.—Tonti, op. cit., 83. Nadouches.—La Harpe, op. cit., 68. Nataché.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., IV, 178, 1880. Natassi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 43, 1884 (Caddo name). Nay-tassa.—Robin, Voy. à la Louisiane, III, 3, 1807.

Natatladiltin (Nata-tla-diltin, 'agave plant'). An Apache clan or band at San Carlos agency and Ft. Apache, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Natcho, Natchez. See Nahche.

Natchesan Family. A linguistic family established by Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 1891), consisting of two tribes, usually known under the names Natchez and Ta-ensa, each comprising several villages. The former dwelt near the present city of Natchez, Miss., the latter near Newellton, La. For the relationship of these two tribes we are dependent entirely on the categorical statements of early French writers, as not a word of Taensa is certainly known to exist. A supposed grammar of this language was published by Adam and Parissot, but it is still under suspicion. For the probable relations of this supposed family with the Muskogean, see Natchez.

> Natches.—Gallatin in Trans. and Coll. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 95, 306, 1836 (Natches only); Prichard, Phys. Hist. Leg., I, 33, 1884; Gatschet in Science, 414, Apr. 29, 1887 (Taensas only).

Natchez. A well-known tribe that formerly lived on and about St. Catherine's cr., E. and S. of the present city of Natchez, Miss. The name, belonging to a single town, was extended to the tribe and entire group of towns, which included also peoples of alien blood who had been conquered by the Natchez or had taken refuge with them. Iberville, on his ascent of the Mississippi in 1699, names, in the Choctaw language, the following 8 towns, exclusive of Natchez proper: Achougoulas, Cogoucoula, Ousagoucoula, Pochougoula, Thoucoue, Tougoulas, Yatanocas, and Ynacachas. Of these, Tougoulas and perhaps Thoucoue are the Tioux (q. v.) towns. It is probably safe to infer that the 9 towns, including Natchez, represented the entire group, and that the Corn, Gray, Jenezenague, White Apple, and White Earth villages are only other names for some of the above, with which it is now impossible to identify them. The Tioux and Grigras were two nations under the protection of the Natchez; both were of alien blood. Du Pratz alludes to a tradition that the Taensa and Chitimacha were formerly united with the Natchez, but left them, though the latter had always recognized them as brothers. The Taensa were, indeed, probably an offshoot of the Natchez, but the Chitimacha were of a distinct linguistic family.

It is difficult to form an estimate of the numerical strength of this tribe, as the figures given vary widely. It is probable that in 1682, when first visited by the French, they numbered about 6,000, and were able to put from 1,000 to 1,200 warriors in the field.

The Natchez engaged in three wars with the French, in 1716, 1722, and 1729. The last, which proved fatal to their nation, was caused by the attempt of the French governor, Chopart, to occupy the site of their principal village as a plantation, and it opened with a general massacre of the French at Fort Rosalie, established in 1716. The French, in retaliation, attacked the Natchez villages with a strong force of Choctaw allies, and in 1730 the Natchez abandoned their villages, separating into three bodies. A small section remained not far from their former home, and a second body fled to Sicily id., near Washita r., where they were attacked early in 1731 by the French, many of them killed, and about 450 captured and sold into slavery in Santo Domingo. The third and most numerous division was received by the Chickasaw and built a village near them in N. Mississippi, called by Adair, Nanne Hamgeh; in 1735 these refugees numbered 180 warriors, or a total of about 700. In the year last named a body of Natchez refugees settled in South Carolina by permission of the colonial government, but some years later moved up to the Cherokee country, where they still kept their distinct town and language up to about the year 1800. The principal body of refugees, however, had settled on Tallahassee cr., an affluent of Coosa r. Hawkins in 1799 estimated their gun-men at about 50. They occupied the whole of one town called Natchez and part of Abikudshi. The Natchez were therefore not exterminated by the French, as has frequently been stated, but after suffering severe losses the remainders scattered far and wide among alien tribes. A few survivors, who speak their own language, still exist in Indian Ter., living with the Cherokee, and in the councils of the Creeks until recently had one representative.

Though the accounts of the Natchez that have come down to us appear to be highly colored, it is evident that this tribe, and doubtless others on the lower Mississippi, occupied a somewhat anomalous position among the Indians. They seem to have been a strictly sedentary people, depending for their livelihood chiefly upon agriculture. They had developed considerable skill in the arts, and wove a textile fabric from the inner bark of the mulberry which they employed for clothing. They made excellent pottery and raised mounds of earth upon which to erect their dwellings and temples. They were also one of the eastern tribes that practised head-flattening. In the main the Natchez appear to have been peaceable, though like other tribes they were involved in frequent quarrels with their neighbors. All accounts agree in attributing to them an extreme form of sun worship and a highly developed ritual. Moreover, the position and function of chief among them differed markedly from that among other tribes, as their head chief seems to have had absolute power over the property and lives of his subjects. On his death his wives were expected to surrender their lives, and parents offered their children as sacrifices. The nation was divided into two exogamic classes, nobility and commoners or michmichgupi, the former being again divided into suns, nobles proper, and esteemed men. Children of women of these three had the rank of their mother, but children of common women fell one grade below that of their father. There were various ways, however, by which a man could raise himself from one grade to another at least as far as the middle grade of nobles. While the commoners consisted partially of subject tribes, the great majority appear to have been as pure Natchez as the nobility. In spite of great lexical divergence, there is little doubt that the Natchez language is a Muskogean dialect.

Natchez. The principal village of the Natchez, probably situated on St Catherine's cr., near the Liberty road bridge, about 3 m. from the present city of Natchez, Miss. Later this name was given to a town of the refugee Natchez among the Upper Creeks.

Natchitoch (Caddo form, Nāshi'tosh). A tribe of the Caddo confederacy which spoke a dialect similar to that of the Yatasi but different from that of the Kadohadacho and its closely affiliated tribes. Their villages were in the neighborhood of the present city of Natchitoches, near those of another tribe called Doustioni (q. v.). Whether the army of De Soto encountered them is unknown, but after La Salle's tragic death among the Hasinai his companions traversed their country, and Douay speaks of them as a "powerful nation." In 1690 Tonti reached them from the Mississippi and made an alliance; and in 1699 Iberville learned of them through a Taensa Indian, but did not visit them in person. Next year, however, he sent his brother Bienville across to them from the Taensa villages. From that time and throughout the many vicissitudes of the 18th century the tribe never broke faith with the French. In 1705 they came to St Denis, commandant of the first French fort on the Mississippi, and asked to be settled in some place where they might obtain provisions, as their corn had been ruined. They were placed near the Acolapissa, and remained there until 1712 when St Denis took them back to their old country to assist him in establishing a new post as a protection against Spanish encroachments, and also in the hope of opening up commercial relations. This post, to which a garrison was added in 1714, remained an important center for trade and travel toward the S. W. for more than a century. St Denis sent messages to the tribes living in the vicinity, urging them to abandon their villages and come to settle near the post, assuring them that he would never forsake them. Some of the tribes yielded to his persuasions, hoping to find safety during the disturbances of the period, but the movement only accelerated the disintegration already begun. In 1731, St Denis, at the head of the Natchitoch and other Indians, besides a few Spaniards, inflicted severe defeat on a strong party of Natchez under the Flour chief, killing about 80 of them. The Natchez, after their wars against the French, had fled to Red r. and were living not far from the trading post and fort. The importance of this establishment and the friendliness of the Natchitoch made the latter so conspicuous in the affairs of the time that during the first half of the 18th century Red r. was known as the Natchitoch, a variant of Nashitosh or Natchitoch. Du Pratz states that about 1730 their village near the French post numbered 200 cabins. Owing to wars in which they were forced to take part, to the introduction of new diseases, particularly smallpox and measles, the population of the tribe rapidly declined. In his report to President Jefferson, in 1805, Sibley gives their number as only 50, and adds, "The French inhabitants have a great respect for these natives, and a number of families have a mixture of their blood in them." Shortly afterward they ceased to exist as a distinct tribe, having been completely amalgamated with the other tribes of the Caddo confederacy (q. v.), from whom they differed in no essential of custom, or of ceremonial or social organization. Natick ('the place of (our) search.'—Tooker). A village founded by Indian converts, mainly Massachuset, under the supervision of the noted missionary John Eliot, in 1650, near the present Natick, Mass. Soon after its establishment it numbered about 150 inhabitants, who were given a reserve of 6,000 acres. It increased in population and after King Philip's war was the principal Indian village in that region. In 1749 there were 166 Indians connected with the settlement. On the breaking out of the French and Indian war in 1754 many of the Natick Indians enlisted against the French. Some never returned, and the others brought back an infectious disease which rapidly reduced the population. In 1764 there were 37 in the village and some others connected with it. In 1792 the whole body numbered but 25 or 30, and soon thereafter they had become so mixed with negroes and whites as to be no longer distinguishable. It was reported in Dec. 1821, that Hannah Dexter, 76 years of age, "the last of the Naticks," had been murdered by her grandson at Natick. For a discussion of the name, consult Tooker, Algonquian Series, x, 1901. See Missions. (J. M.)

Nation, The. A term formerly applied to several of the larger and more important tribes and confederacies in the Gulf states, particularly the Creeks, but also to the Cherokee, Catawba, Choctaw, and Chickasaw. At present it is an official term applied to each of the Five Civilized Tribes (q. v.) in Oklahoma, viz, the Cherokee, Creeks, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole. The term Les Nations was used by Canadian French writers of the 17th and 18th centuries (and occasionally in English writings) to designate the heathen tribes, who were distinguished into Les grandes Nations and Les petites Nations. The Rivière des petites Nations in the province of Quebec preserves this designation. Specifically Le petit Nation was the Weskarini, q. v.

(H. W. H. A. F. C.)

National Indian Association. A society for improving the condition of the Indians. It originated in Philadelphia in 1879 with a memorial circulated by Mary L. Bonney and Amelia Stone Quinton petitioning the Government to prevent the encroachments of white settlers on Indian territory and to guard the Indians in the enjoyment of all the rights guaranteed to them on the faith of the Nation. A second memorial in 1880 obtained 50,000 signatures, and a third in 1881, signed by 100,000 persons, asked for all Indians common school and industrial teaching, land in severalty, and the full status of citizens. The association, formally constituted in 1880, and taking the name the National Indian Association in 1882, changing it to the Women's National Indian Association in 1883, was the first body of friends of the Indians to demand for them citizenship and lands in severalty. For these objects it labored till 1884, when missionary work was added, and since then it has established for 50 tribes or tribal remnants Christian missions, erecting more than 50 buildings, which when well established were given to the various permanent denominational missionary societies. A home building and loan department, a young people's department, libraries, special education for bright Indians, and hospital work were added later. The National Indian Association, which resumed its earlier name in 1901, has asked for more schools, an increase in the number of field matrons, the righting of various wrongs, and protection and justice to many tribes, and has constantly advocated the application of civil service reform principles to the entire Indian service, the gradual abolition of Indian agencies, the payment of debts due Indians from the Government, and other measures needed to prepare Indians for civilized self-support and good citizenship. Since 1888 the Association has published a periodical called The Indian's Friend. (A. S. Q.)

Natsitkutchin ('strong people'). A Kutchin tribe inhabiting the country from Porcupine r. northward to the Romanzof mts., Alaska. Gibbs (Notes on Ross, Tinne MS., B. A. E.) said that their habitat began in a mountainous region from 50 to 100 m. s. of Ft Yukon. They hunt the caribou as far as the seacoast, being a shifting people. They are chiefly known from their trading with the Kangmaligniut Eskimo, and for the strong labiche that they make. They resemble the Kutchakutchin in physique and manners. Richardson gave their number as 40 men in 1850; Gibbs (op. cit.) stated that they had 20 hunters; Petroff in 1880 gave the total population as 120. The Teahinkutchin probably belonged to this tribe.

Natsshostanno. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned to Joutel in 1687 (Margry, Déc., iii, 409, 1878) by the chief of the Kadohadacho on Red r. of Louisiana as being among his enemies.

Natsushltatunne (Na'-tsúcl-ta'-hunné', 'people dwelling where they play shinny'). A former village of the Mishikhwutmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 232, 1890.

Nattahattawants. A Nipmuc chief of Musketaquid, the present Concord, Mass., in 1642. At this time he sold to Simon Willard, in behalf of Gov. Winthrop and others, a large tract of land on both sides of Concord r., in consideration of which he received "six fathom of waompampege, one wastcot, and one breeches" (Drake, Bk. Inds., 54, 1833). Nattahattawants was a supporter and propagator of Christianity among his people, and an honest and upright man. His son, John, usually known as John Tahattawan, lived at Nashobah, Mass., where he was the chief ruler of the Praying Indians. His daughter became the wife of the celebrated Waban (q. v.).

Natuwanpika (Ná-tu-wan-pi-ka). One of the traditional stopping places of the Bear clan of the Hopi, situated near the present Oraibi, Ariz.

Naugatuck. A former village, subject to the Paugusset, at the falls of Naugatuck r., near Derby, Conn. (Trumbull, Conn., i, 42, 1818). The name refers to a tree, which probably served as a landmark, said to have stood near Rock Rimmon, in what is now Seymour, Conn. (Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 36, 1881).

Nauhaught. A Massachusetts Indian, called Elisha and also Joseph, a deacon in 1758 or 1760 of an Indian church that stood on the s. side of Swan's pond, at Yarmouth, Mass. He was a conscientious man and the hero of Whittier's

"Nauhaught the Deacon," in which the poet alludes to his bravery in overcoming temptation. See also Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., v, 56, 1816.

Naumkeag ('fishing place,' from na-maas 'fish,' ki 'place,' -ag 'at'). A tribe or band, probably belonging to the Pennacook confederacy, which formerly occupied the site of Salem, Mass. It appears, however, that the natives had abandoned the locality before the English reached it, as there is no record that the latter found any Indians on the spot. It has been noticed in regard to the native burials in this locality that the bodies were usually placed in a sitting posture.

Nause. A former tribe or probably a subdivision of the Nanticoke in Dorchester co., Md. In 1608 their principal village, of the same name, was on the n. bank of Nanticoke r., near its mouth.—Smith (1629), Va., I, 175, repr. 1819.

Nauset. An Algonquian tribe formerly living in Massachusetts, on that part of C. Cod r. of Bass r., forming a part of or being under control of the Wampanoag.

A writer (Coll. Mass. Hist. Soc., 1st s., VIII, 159, 1802) says: "The Indians in the county of Barnstable were a distinct people, but they were subject in some respects to the chief sachem of the Wampanoag." They probably came in contact with the whites at an early date, as the cape was frequently visited by navigators. From this tribe Hunt in 1614 carried off 7 natives and sold them into slavery with 20 Indians of Patuxet. Champlain had an encounter with the Nauset immediately before returning to Europe. They seem to have escaped the great pestilence which prevailed along the New England coast in 1617. Although disposed to attack the colonists at their first meeting, they became their fast friends, and with few exceptions remained faithful to them through King Philip's war, even in some instances lending assistance. Most of them had been Christianized before this war broke out. Their estimated population in 1621 was 500, but this is probably below their real strength at that time, as they seem to have numbered as many 80 years afterward. About 1710, by which time they were all organized into churches, they lost a great many by fever. In 1764 they had decreased to 106, living mainly at Potanumagunt, but in 1802 only 4 were said to remain. Their principal village, Nauset, was near the present Eastham. Although their location indicates that fish furnished their chief sustenance, the Nauset were evidently cultivators of the soil, as supplies of corn and beans were obtained from them by the furnishing Plymouth colonists in 1622.

The following villages were probably Nauset: Aquetnet, Ashimuit, Cataumut, Coatuit, Cummaquid, Manamovik, Manomet, Mashpee, Mattakeset, Meeshawn, Namskaket, Nauset, Nobecusset, Panet, Pawpoesit, Pispogutt, Poponesset, Potanumaquut, Punonakanit, Satucket, Satuit, Skauton, Succonesset, Waquoit, and Weesquols.

Navaho (pron. Na'-ru-ho, from Tewa Narakú, the name referring to a large area of cultivated lands; applied to a former Tewa pueblo, and, by extension, to the Navaho, known to the Spaniards of the 17th century as Apaches de Navajó, who intruded on the Tewa domain or who lived in the vicinity, to distinguish them from other "Apache" bands.—Hewett in Am. Anthropol., VIII, 193, 1906. Fray Alonso Benavides, in his Memorial of 1630, gives the earliest translation of the tribal name, in the form Nauajò, 'sementeras grandes'—'great seed-sowings', or 'great fields'. The Navaho themselves do not use this name, except when trying to speak English. All do not know it, and none of the older generation pronounce it correctly, as r is a sound unknown in their language. They call themselves /Iné', which means simply 'people'. This word, in various forms, is used as a tribal name by nearly every people of the Athapaskan stock).

An important Athapaskan tribe occupying a reservation of 9,503,763 acres in s. e. Arizona, n. w. New Mexico, and s. e. Utah. Here they are supposed to remain, but many isolated families live beyond the reservation boundaries in all directions. Their land has an average elevation of about 6,000 ft above sea level. The highest point in it is Pastora peak, in the Carrizo mts., 9,420 ft high. It is an arid region and not well adapted to agriculture, but it affords fair pasturage. For this reason the Navaho have devoted their attention less to agriculture than to stock raising. There were formerly few places on the reservation, away from the borders of the Rio San Juan, where the soil could be irrigated, but there were many spots, apparently desert, where water gathered close to the surface and where by deep planting crops of corn, beans, squashes, and melons were raised. Within the last few years the Government has built storage reservoirs on the reservation and increased the facilities for irrigation.

It may be that under the loosely applied name Apache there is a record of the Navaho by Oñate as early as 1598, but the first to mention them by name was Zarate-Salmeron, about 1629. They had Christian missionaries among them in the middle of the 18th century (see Cibolleta, Encinal), but their teachings did not prevail against paganism. For many years previous to the occupancy of their country by the United States they kept up an almost constant predatory war with the Pueblos and the white settlers of New Mexico, in which they were usually the victors. When the United States took possession of New Mexico in 1849 these depredations were at their height. The first military expedition into their country was that of Col. Alex. W. Doniphan, of the First Missouri Volunteers, in the fall of 1846. On behalf of the United States, Doniphan made the first treaty of peace with the Navaho Nov. 22 of that year, but the peace was not lasting. In 1849, another military force, under the command of Col. John M. Washington, penetrated the Navaho land as far as Chelly canyon, and made another treaty of peace on Sept. 9, but this treaty was also soon broken. To put a stop to their wars, Col. "Kit" Carson invaded their territory in 1863, killed so many of their sheep as to leave them without means of support, and took the greater part of the tribe prisoners to Ft Sumner at the Bosque Redondo on the Rio Pecos, N. Mex. Here they were kept in captivity until 1867, when they were restored to their original country and given a new supply of sheep. Since that time they have remained at peace and greatly prospered.

There is no doubt that the Navaho have increased in number since they first became known to the United States, and are still increasing. In 1867, while they were still prisoners and could be counted accurately, 7,300 of them were held in captivity at one time; but, owing to escapes and additional surrenders, the number varied. All were not captured by Carson. Perhaps the most accurate census was taken in 1869, when the Government called them to receive a gift of 30,000 sheep and 2,000 goats. The Indians were put in a large corral and counted as they went in; only a few herders were

The result showed that there were somewhat fewer than 9,000, making allowance for absentees. According to the census of 1890, which was taken on a head system, the tribe numbered 10,000. The census of 1900 places the population at more than 20,000, and in 1910 they were roughly estimated by the Office to number 28,500. According to the best recorded version of the origin legend, the first or nuclear Navaho was created by the Arizonia or Utah about 500 years ago. People had lived on the earth before, but most of them had been destroyed by giants or demons. When the Aryan; consequently, the Navaho are a very composite people. A notable accession was made to their numbers, probably in the 16th century, when the Thkha-paha-dunay joined them. These were a people of another linguistic stock—Hodge says "doubtless Tanoan"—for they wrought a change in the Navaho language. A later very numerous accession of several clans came from the Pacific story is that the gods created the first man, and he knew not whence they came, and he had no antecedent tradition of them. It is thus with many other Navaho legends. The story gives the impression that these Indians wandered into Mexico and Arizona in small groups, and in single families. In the course of time other groups joined them until, in the 19th century, they felt strong enough to wage war. Some of the accessions were evidently of Athapascan origin, as of the tribe, but others were decidedly different stocks, including Keshonean, Tanoan, Yuman, and coast; these were Athapascan. Some of the various clans joined the Navaho willingly, others are the descendants of captives. Hodge has shown that this Navaho origin legend, omitting a few obviously mythic elements, can be substantiated by recorded history, but he places the beginning at less than 500 years.

The Navaho are classed as belonging to the widespread Athapascan linguistic family, and a vocabulary of their language shows that the majority of their words have counterparts in dialects of Alaska, British America, and California. The grammatical structure is like that of Athapaskan tongues in general, but many words have been inherited from other sources. The grammar is intricate and the vocabulary copious, abounding especially in local names.

NAVAHO (CAYATAMTA)

The appearance of the Navaho strengthens the traditional evidence of their very composite origin. It is impossible to describe a prevailing type; they vary in size from stalwart men of 6 ft or more to some who are diminutive in stature. In feature they vary from the strong faces with aquiline noses and prominent chins common with the Dakota and other northern tribes to the subdued features of the Pueblos. Their faces are a little more hirsute than those of Indians farther E. Many have occiputs so flattened that the skulls are brachycephalic or hyperbrachycephalic, a feature resulting from the hard cradle-board on which the head rests in infancy. According to Hrdlicka (Am. Anthropol., 11, 339, 1900) they approach the Pueblos physically much more closely than the Apache, notwithstanding their linguistic connection with the latter. In general their faces are intelligent and pleasing. Hughes (Doniphan's Exped., 1846) says of them: "They are celebrated for intelligence and good order . . . the noblest of American aborigines." There is nothing somber or stolid in their character. Among themselves they are merry and jovial, much given to jest and banter. They are very industrious, and the proudest among them scorn no remunerative labor. They do not bear pain with the fortitude displayed among the militant tribes of the N., nor do they inflict upon themselves equal tortures. They are, on the whole, a progressive people.

NAVAHO

The tribe is divided into a number of clans, 51 clan names having been recorded, but the number of existing clans may be somewhat more or less. Two of these are said to be extinct, and others nearly so. The clans are grouped in phratries. Some authorities give 8 of these, others 11, with 3 independent clans; but the phratry does not seem to be a well-defined group among the Navaho. Descent is in the female line; a man belongs to the clan of his mother, and when he marries must take a woman of some other clan. The social position of the women is high and their influence great. They often possess much property in their own right, which marriage does not alienate from them. The clans, so far as known, are as follows:

Aatsosni, Narrow gorge; Ashihi, Salt; Bithani, Folded arms; Dsihlnaathihlni, Encircled mountain; Dsihlthani, Brow of the mountain; Dsihltilani, Base of the mountain; Kai, Willows; Kanani, Living arrows; Khalbso, Yellow bodies; Khashhlizhni, Mud; Khaskankhatso, Much yucca; Khoghanhlani, Many huts; Khonagani, Place of walking; Kinaani, High standing house; Kinhlitshi, Red house (of stone); Klogi, Name of an old pueblo; Loka, Reeds (phragmites); Maitheshkizh, Coyote pass (Jemez); Maitho, Coyote spring; Naai, Monocline; Nakai, White stranger (Mexican); Nakhopani, Brown streak, horizontal on the ground; Nanashthezhin, Black horizontal stripe aliens (Zuñi); Notha, Ute; Pinbitho, Deer spring; Theshitshini, Red streak; Thildzhehi; Thkhaneza, Among the scattered (hills); Thkhapaha, Among the waters; Thkhatshini, Among the Red (waters or banks); Thobazhnaazh, Two come for water; Thochalsithaya, Water under the sitting frog; Thoditshini, Bitter water; Thokhani, Beside the water; Thodhokongzhi, Saline water; Thotsoni, Great water; Thoyetlini, Junction of the rivers; Tlastshini, Red flat; Tlizihlani, Many goats; Tsayiskithni, Sagebrush hill; Tsezhinkini, House of the black cliffs; Tsenahapihlni, Overhanging rocks; Tsetheshkizhni, Rocky pass; Tsethkhani, Among the rocks; Tsetlani, Bend in a canyon; Tseyanathoni, Horizontal water under cliffs; Tseyikehe, Rocks standing near one another; Tsezhinthiai, Trap dyke; Tsinazhini, Black horizontal forest; Tsinsakathni, Lone tree; Yoo, Beads.

The ordinary Navaho dwelling, or hogan, is a very simple structure, although erected with much ceremony (see Mindeleff in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 1898). It is usually conical in form, built of sticks set on end, covered with branches, grass, and earth, and often so low that a man of ordinary stature can not stand erect in it. One must stoop to enter the doorway, which is usually provided with a short passage or storm door. There is no chimney; a hole in the apex lets out the smoke. Some hogans are rude polygonal structures of logs laid horizontally; others are partly of stone. In summer, "lean-to" sheds and small inclosures of branches are often used for habitations. Sweat houses are small, conical hogans without the hole in the apex, for fires are not lighted in them; temperature is increased by means of stones heated in fires outside. Medicine lodges, when built in localities where trees of sufficient size grow, are conical structures like the ordinary hogans, but much larger. When built in regions of low-sized trees, they have flat roofs. Of late, substantial stone structures with doors, windows, and chimneys are replacing the rude hogans. One reason they built such houses was that custom and superstition constrained them to destroy or desert a house in which death had occurred. Such a place was called chindi-hogan, meaning 'devil-house'. Those who now occupy good stone houses carry out the dying and let them expire outside, thus saving their dwellings, and indeed the same custom is sometimes practised in connection with the hogan. No people have greater dread of ghosts and mortuary remains.

The most important art of the Navaho is that of weaving. They are especially celebrated for their blankets, which are in high demand among the white people on account of their beauty and utility; but they also weave belts, garters, and saddlegirths—all with rude, simple looms. Their legends declare that in the early days they knew not the art of weaving by means of a loom. The use of the loom was probably taught to them by the Pueblo women who were incorporated into the tribe. They dressed in skins and rude mats constructed by hand, of cedar bark and other vegetal fibers. The few basket makers among them are said to be Ute or Paiute girls or their descendants, and these do not do much work. What they make, though of excellent quality, is confined almost exclusively to two forms required for ceremonial purposes. The Navaho make very little pottery, and this of a very ordinary variety, being designed merely for cooking purposes; but formerly they made a fine red ware decorated in black with characteristic designs. They grind corn and other grains by hand on the metate. For ceremonial purposes they still bake food in the ground and in other aboriginal ways. For many years they have had among them silversmiths who fabricate handsome ornaments with very rude appliances, and who undoubtedly learned their art from the Mexicans, adapting it to their own environment. Of late years many of those who have been taught in training schools have learned civilized trades and civilized methods of cooking.

Investigations conducted within the last 25 years show that the Navaho, contrary to early published beliefs, are a highly religious people having many well-defined divinities (nature gods, animal gods, and local gods), a vast mythic and legendary lore, and thousands of significant formulated songs and prayers which must be learned and repeated in the most exact manner. They also have hundreds of musical compositions which experts have succeeded in noting and have pronounced similar to our own music. The so-called dances are ceremonies which last for 9 nights and parts of 10 days, and the medicine-men spend many years of study in learning to conduct a single one properly. One important feature of these ceremonies is the pictures painted in dry powders on the floor of the medicine lodge (see Dry-painting). All this cultus is of undoubted antiquity.

The most revered of their many deities is a goddess named Estsánatlehi, or 'Woman Who Changes', 'Woman Who Rejuvenates Herself', because she is said never to stay in one condition, but to grow old and become young again at will. She is probably Mother Nature, an apotheosis of the changing year.

By treaty of Canyon de Chelly, Ariz., Sept. 9, 1849, the Navaho acknowledged the sovereignty of the United States. By treaty of Fort Sumner, N. Mex., June 1, 1868, a reservation was set apart for them in Arizona and New Mexico, and they ceded to the United States their claim to other lands. Their reservation has been modified by subsequent Executive orders.

Navahu (Na-ra-hu', referring to 'large area of cultivated lands'). A former Tewa pueblo situated in the second valley s. of the great pueblo and cliff village of Puye, w. of Santa Clara pueblo, in the Pajarito Park, N. Mex. The name refers to the large areas of cultivated lands in the vicinity, and by extension was applied to the Navaho (q. v.). Consult Hewett (1) in Am Anthropol., viii, 193, 1906; (2) Bull. 32, B. A. E., 16, 1906.

Navasink ('at the promontory'). A tribe of the Unami branch of the Delawares formerly living in the highlands of Navesink, N. J., claiming the land from Barnegat to the Raritan. Hudson, who encountered them immediately after entering the bay of New York, describes them as "clothed in mantles of feathers and robes of fur, the women clothed in hemp; red copper pipes, and other things of copper they did wear about their necks." They appear to have passed out of history soon after their lands were sold.

Navawi (Na-ra-wi', 'place of the hunting trap'). A group of ancient Tewa ruins w. of the Rio Grande, situated between the Rito de los Frijoles and Santa Clara canyon, s. w. of San Ildefonso, N. Mex. They consist of two large buildings about 200 yds. apart, several clan houses on the mesa near by, and a cliff village of considerable extent in the base of the low mesa to the s. and w. The ruin takes its name from a pitfall (nara) on the narrow neck of mesa about 300 yds. w. of the pueblo ruin, at the convergence of four trails.

Nawat ('Left-hand'). The principal chief of the Southern Arapaho since the death of Little Raven (q. v.) in 1889. He was born about 1840, and became noted as a warrior and buffalo hunter, taking active part in the western border wars until the treaty of Medicine Lodge in 1867, since which time his people, as a tribe, have remained at peace with the whites. In 1890 he took the lead in signing the allotment agreement opening the reservation to white settlement, notwithstanding the Cheyenne, in open council, had threatened death to anyone who signed. He several times visited Washington in the interest of his tribe. Having become blind, he has recently resigned his authority to a younger man. (J. M.)

Nawkaw (? 'Wood'). A Winnebago chief, known also as Carrymaunee ('Walking Turtle'), because he was a member of the Walking Turtle family, the ruling family of the tribe. He was born in 1735, and died at the advanced age of 98 years in 1833. His residence was at Big Green lake, between Green Bay and Ft Winnebago (Portage), Wis., and 30 m. from the latter. The earliest recorded notice of Nawkaw relates to his presence, as principal chief of his tribe, at the battle of the Thames, Canada, Oct.

NAWKAW. AFTER M. KENNEY AND HALL.

5, 1813, and that he was beside Tecumseh when the latter fell (Wis. Hist. Coll., xiv, 86, 1898). If the statement in regard to his age be correct, Nawkaw was at that time 78 years of age. That he was active in behalf of his tribe in peaceful measures for the remaining years of his life is evident from the fact that he was one of the chief agents of the Winnebago in making settlements and treaties on their behalf. His name, in various forms (Carimine, Karry-Man-ee, Nan-kaw, Nau-kaw-kary-maunie, Karawanu, and Onu-naka), is attached to the treaties of St Louis, Mo., June 3, 1816; Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825; Butte des Morts, Wis., Aug. 11, 1827; Green Bay, Wis., Aug. 25, 1828; and Prairie du Chien, Aug. 1, 1829. But his most important acts in behalf of peace were his efforts in keeping his people from taking part in the Black Hawk war in 1832. "The policy of Nawkaw," say McKenney and Hall (Ind. Tribes, i, 316, 1858), "was decidedly pacific, and his conduct was consistent with his judgment and professions. To keep his followers from temptation, as well as to place them under the eye of an agent of our government, he encamped with them near the agency, under the charge of Mr Kinzie." It was chiefly through his exertions that Red Bird and his accomplices in the Gagner murder were surrendered, and through his influence that clemency was obtained for them, for which purpose he visited Washington in 1829; but the pardon for Red Bird came after he died in prison at Prairie du Chien. Nawkaw was a large man, 6 ft tall and well built. Mrs. Kinzie (Wau-Bun, 89, 1858) says he was a stalwart Indian, with a broad, pleasant countenance, the great peculiarity of which was an immense under lip, hanging nearly to his chin; this is seen to some extent in his portrait. He is described as a sagacious man, of firm, upright character and pacific disposition, who filled his station with dignity and commanded respect by his fidelity. One of his daughters, Flight-of-Geese, married Choukeka, or Spoon Dekaury (Wis. Hist. Coll., xiii, 455, 1895). A descendant of Nawkaw was living at Stevens Point, Wis., in 1887. (C. T.)

Neamathla. (Ima'la is a war and busk title, corresponding nearly to 'disciplinarian'). A Seminole chief who acquired considerable note during the Indian hostilities of 1824-36. He was by birth a Creek, and had come into notice before the war of 1812, but is not mentioned as a chief until 1820. He is spoken of by Gov. Duval, of Florida, as a man of uncommon ability, a noted orator, with great influence among his people, and in 1824 as desirous of being on terms of amity with the United States. Neamathla was one of the signers of the treaty of Camp Moultrie, Sept. 18, 1823, by which about 5,000,000 acres of land were ceded to the United States. This treaty, which was repudiated by a large portion of the tribe, led by Osceola, was the primary cause of the war which shortly followed. His settlement, known also as Ft. Town and Nehe Marthla's Town (Woodward, Reminis., 153, 1859) was situated s. of Flint r., Ga., and was destroyed in the war of 1816-17. Because of his treatment by the Florida authorities he returned to the Creek Nation, where he was well received, and became an influential member of the general council held at Tukabatchi. The name Neah Emarthla is signed on behalf of the Hitchiti towns to the Creek treaty of Nov. 15, 1827. See McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, I, 77, 1858.

Neapope. See Nahpope.

Nebaunabay (Nhanubä, 'sleeping person'). A mythic character whose home is said to be on the floor of the sea; the term is also applied to an under-water bear. Hence the "Merman" gens of the Chippewa (Warren, Ojibways, 44, 1885.) (W. J.)

Noblazhotama ('blue river village', from nublezan, the Kansa name for Mississippi r., and tanman, 'village'). An ancient Kansa village on the w. bank of the Mississippi a few miles above the mouth of Missouri r. in the present Missouri. The territory was later occupied by the Sauk and Foxes.

Ne-bla-zhe-tä'-mä.—Morgan in N. Am. Rev., 45, 1870.

Nechanicok. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the s. bank of the Chickahominy in the lower part of Henrico co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Nechau. One of the nine tribes mentioned by Francisco de Jesús María as constituting the Hasinai, or southern Caddo confederacy. He described its location as s. e. of the Nabadache tribe, and half a league from the Nacono (Relación, 1691, MS.). In 1721 Peña, in his diary, stated that the Indians of el Macono lived 5 leagues from the crossing of the Neches at the Neche village (Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, XXVIII, 36, MS.). The Nechau apparently are not mentioned thereafter; they were probably absorbed by their neighbors, perhaps the Nabadache. (H. E. B.)

Neche. A Hasinai tribe that, on the coming of the Europeans in the latter part of the 17th century, lived on Neches r. in E. Texas. Their main village was a league or more e. of that stream, nearly w. of the present city of Nacogdoches and near the mounds s. w. of Alto, Cherokee co. This village was visited by La Salle's party, and it was particularly to it and the Nabadache tribe across the stream that Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 336 et seq., 1878) applied the name of "Cenis," his rendering of the Indian group name Hasinai. This Neche tribe was closely allied by language and culture with about a dozen southern Caddoan tribes, including the well-known Nabadache, Nacogdoche, Hainai, and Nasoni. There are strong indications that these southern tribes, under the headship of the Hainai, formed a subconfederacy fairly distinct from the northern group of Caddoan tribes, which were under the headship of the Kadohadacho.

The enemies of the Neche were the common enemies of this southern Caddoan group. In 1687 some members of La Salle's party went with them in a successful campaign against the "Canohatinno." The Yojuanes sometimes invaded the country of the Neche and their neighbors; relations with the Bidai and Eyeish seem to have been ordinarily unfriendly; but chief of all the enemies were the Apache.

Between the Neche and Nacachau the Querétaran friars, in 1716, established San Francisco de los Neches mission, and at the same time Ramón stationed a garrison there. In 1719 the missionaries, fearing a French attack incident to the outbreak of war between France and Spain, deserted this as well as the other E. Texas missions, and left it to be plundered by the Indians. In 1721 Gov. Aguayo rebuilt the mission; but in 1731 it was removed to San Antonio, where it was known as San Francisco de la Espada (Ramón, Derrotero; Representation by the Missionary Fathers, 1716, MS.; Peña, Diario; Espinosa, Crónica Apostólica, 418, 153, et seq.).

The Neche tribe, like all of its neighbors, was insignificant in numbers. In 1721 Aguayo, while at the main Neche village, made presents to 188 men, women, and children, which was considered an unusually "general distribution" of gifts (Peña, Diary of Aguayo's expedition, 1721, MS.). The aggregate of Indians of this and the neighboring tribes dependent on the Neches mission (probably including the Nabedache, Nacono, Nechaui, and Nacachau) was estimated by Espinosa, former president of the missions, at about one thousand (see Francisco de Jesús María, Relación; Ramón, Derrotero; Espinosa, Crónica Apostólica, 439). This estimate must have had a good foundation, for the missionaries kept lists of all the hamlets and households. If Rivera be correct, it would seem that by 1727 part of the Neche tribe had moved across the Rio Neches and occupied the Nabedache site of San Pedro (Rivera, Diario, leg. 2140, 1736). Before the end of the 18th century the tribe apparently became merged with the Nabedache and Hainai tribes, for in the reports of Solís (1767), Barrios (1771), Mezières (1778-79), and others, it was not separately distinguished.

In its main features the social organization of this tribe was similar to that of all the tribes of the group. They lived in agricultural hamlets or single households scattered around a main village. A household consisted of several families living in a large conical grass lodge. The semicommunal households seem to have been organized on the basis of paternal right; but an elder woman served as the economic head. An exogamous clan organization existed, the details of which are not evident. The outlines of the tribal organization are clear. There was an hereditary civil chief (caddiorcää'di) who also had priestly functions. He ruled through a council composed largely of elder and distinguished men, and was assisted by several grades of administrative functionaries or public servants, such as the canabas and the tammus. The latter were messengers and overseers, and inflicted the lesser corporal punishments.

The confederate relations of this tribe with its neighbors were more religious than governmental. The caddi of the Hainai tribe ranked as head chief of the group, but of greater authority than any caddi was the head priest, called chencai, or xinesi, who kept the central fire temple, situated on the edge of the Hainai domain. From this temple all the households of the surrounding tribes kindled their fires, directly or indirectly. For lesser religious and social functions the Neche and the Hainai tribes (together with the Nabedache, perhaps) formed one group, while the Nasoni and the Nacogdoche were the leading tribes of another subgroup for religious purposes (see Francisco de Jesús María, Relación, 1691, MS.; Terán, Descripción y Diaria Demarcación, 1691, MS.; Espinosa, Crónica Apostólica, 424, 430, 1746).

Agriculture, semicommunal in method, was an important source of food supply.

The chief crops raised were corn, beans, sunflowers, melons, calabashes, and tobacco. Besides hunting the deer and small game abounding in the vicinity, the Neche hunted buffalo in season beyond the Brazos, and bear in the forests toward the N. (Francisco de Jesús María, Relación; Joutel, Relation, in Margry, Déc., III, 311, 1878; Peña, Diario, 1721, MS.; Espinosa, Crón. Apostólica, 422). (H. E. B.)

Nechimuasath (Netcimū'usath). A sept of the Seshart, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Necoos. A town, perhaps of the Cape Fear Indians, in 1663, about 20 m. up Cape Fear r., probably in the present Brunswick co., N. C.

Nachees.—Lawson, Voy., 115, repr. 1860. Necoos.—Long et al. (1663) in N. C. Col. Rec., I, 68, 1886; Martin, Hist. N. C., I, 131, 1829.

Necongá. A former village, probably of the Miami, in Miami co., Ind.—Hough in Ind. Geol. Rep., map, 1883.

Necootimeigh. A tribe formerly living at the Dalles of the Columbia in Oregon (Ross, Fur Hunters, I, 186, 1855). It was probably Chinookan, as it was within Chinookan territory; but the name may have been that of a temporary village of a neighboring Shahaptian tribe.

Necotat. A former Clatsop village at the site of Seaside, Clatsop co., Oreg.

Nakot!ā't.—Boas, Chinook Texts, 140, 1894. Necotat.—Lyman in Oreg. Hist. Soc. Quar., I, 321, 1900.

Necpacha. The tribal name assigned to an Indian baptized at mission San Antonio de Valero, Tex., Apr. 12, 1728 (Valero Bautismos, partida 221, MS. in the custody of the Bishop of San Antonio). He died shortly after, and the burial record gives his tribal name as Nacpacha. The name may mean Apache; but this latter form was quite well known at San Antonio at the date named. (H. E. B.)

Nacpacha.—Fray Salva de Amaya in Valero Entierros, partida 79, MS. in the custody of the Bishop of San Antonio.

Nedlung. A Talirpingmiut fall village of the Okomiut Eskimo tribe near the S. E. extremity of L. Netilling, Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Neecoweegee. An unidentified Dakota band, possibly of the Minneconjou.

Nee-cow-ee-gee.—Catlin, N. Am. Inds., I, 222, 1841.

Needles. The true needle with an eye was extremely rare among the Indians, the awl (q. v.) being the universal implement for sewing. The needle and needle case came to be generally employed only after the advent of the whites, although bone needles 3 to 5 in. long are common in Ontario and the Iroquois area of New York.

The few needles that have been found in western archeological sites are large and clumsy and could have been employed only in coarse work, such as the mats of the Quinaielt, who in making them use a wooden needle to tie the rushes together with cord. A similar needle is used in house building by the Papago. The Eskimo, however, possessed fine needles of ivory, suitable for many of the uses to which the steel needle is put, and the metal thimble was imitated in ivory. Among them the needle case, artistically and in other respects, reached its highest development, like all the objects that were subjected to the ingenuity of this people. Eskimo needle cases were usually carved of ivory or formed from hollow bones (Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 1899). In the S. W. the sharp spine of the yucca furnished a natural needle, the thread being formed of the attached fiber. Wooden knitting needles were used among the Pueblos. The N. W. coast tribes sometimes made needle cases of copper and later of iron. (W. H.)

Neerchokioon. A Chinookan tribe, said to number 1,340, found by Lewis and Clark in 1806 on the s. side of Columbia r., a few miles above Sauvie id., Oreg. A division of Lewis and Clark's "Shahala nation." Ne-er-che-ki-oo.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, IV, 246, 1905. Neerchokioo.—Lewis and Clark Exped., II, 217, 238, 1814.

Neeskotting. The gaffing of fish in shallow water at night with the aid of a lantern. A long pole with a hook at the end is used (Starr, Amer. Ind., 51, 1899). The -ing is the English suffix, and neeskot is probably the equivalent in the Massachusetts dialect of Algonquian of the Micmac nigog, 'harpoon' (Ferland, Foy. Canad., 111, 1865), which appears as nigoue in Canadian French. (A. F. C.)

Neeslous. Given as a division of Tsimshian on Laredo canal, n. w. coast of British Columbia. The Haida speak of Nislas as a Tsimshian chief living in this district.

Neeceelows.—Gibbs after Anderson in Hist. Mag., 74, 1862. Neeceelows.—Coues and Kingsley, Stand. Nat. Hist., pt. 6, 136, 1885. Nees-lous.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859.

Negabamat, Noël. A converted Montagnais chief, who lived at Sillery, Quebec; born about the beginning of the 17th century. He was baptized, with his wife Marie and his son Charles, in 1639. Although generally peaceful after embracing Christianity, he frequently engaged in war with the Iroquois, always enemies of the Montagnais. In 1652 he was a member of a delegation sent by his tribe to solicit aid from Gov. Dudley, of New England, against the Iroquois. He also appeared in behalf of his people and acted on the part of the French during the convention at Three Rivers, Quebec, in 1645, where a treaty of peace was made with the Iroquois and other tribes. He was selected by Père Druliettes to accompany him on his visit to the Abnaki in 1651, at which time he was alluded to by the French as "Captain Sillery." It was through his efforts that peace was made by the French with one of the tribes on the coast s. of Quebec, neighbors of the Abnaki, seemingly the Malecite or Norridgewock. On his death, Mar. 19, 1666, his war chief, Negaskouat, became his successor. Negabamat was a firm friend of the French, and after his conversion was their chief counsellor in regard to their movements on the lower St Lawrence. (C. T.)

Negahnquet, Albert. A Potawatomi, the first full-blood Indian of the United States to be ordained a Roman Catholic priest. Born near St Marys, Kans., in 1874, he moved with his parents to the Potawatomi res. (now Pottawatomie co., Okla.), where he entered the Catholic mission school conducted by the Benedictine monks at Sacred Heart Mission, making rapid progress in his studies and gaining the friendship of his teachers by his tractable character. Later he entered the College of the Propaganda Fide in Rome, and was there ordained a priest in 1903. The same year he returned to America and has since engaged in active religious work among the Indians.

Negaouichirinioneuk ('people of the fine sandy beach.'—A. F. C.). A tribe or band living in 1658 in the vicinity of the mission of St Michel near the head of Green bay, Wis.; probably a part of the Ottawa tribe, possibly the Nassauaketon. They are located by the Jesuit Relation of 1648 on the s. side of L. Huron in the vicinity of the Ottawa. In 1658, fleeing before the Iroquois, they came to the country of the Potawatomi at Green bay precisely as the Ottawa did and at the same time. Negaouich.—Tailhan in Perrot, Mém., 221, 1864 ('les Illinois Negaouich'). Negaouichirinioneuk.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 21, 1858. Negaouichirinioneuk.—Perrot (ca. 1720), Mém., 221, 1864. Nigouaouichirinik.—Jes. Rel. 1648, 62, 1858.

Negas. A former Abnaki village in Penobscot co., Me.

Negas.—Willis in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., IV, 108, 1856. Nique.—Alcedo, Dic. Geog., III, 835, 1788 (identical?).

Negro and Indian. The first negro slaves were introduced into the New World (1501-03) ostensibly to labor in the place of the Indians, who showed themselves ill-suited to enforced tasks and, moreover, were being exterminated in the Spanish colonies. The Indian-negro intermixture has proceeded on a larger scale in South America, but not a little has also taken place in various parts of the northern continent. Wood (New England's Prospect, 77, 1634) tells how some Indians of Massachusetts in 1633, coming across a negro in the top of a tree, were frightened, surmising that "he was Abamacho, or the devil." Nevertheless, intermixture of Indians and negroes has occurred in New England. About the middle of the 18th century the Indians of Marthas Vineyard began to intermarry with negroes, the result being that "the mixed race increased in numbers and improved in temperance and industry." A like intermixture with similar results is reported about the same time from parts of C. Cod. Among the Mashpee in 1802 very few pure Indians were left, there being a number of mulattoes (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., i, 206; -iv, 206; ibid., 2d s., iii, 4; cf. Prince in Am. Anthropol., ix, no. 3, 1907). Robert Rantoul in 1833 (Hist. Coll. Essex Inst., xxiv, 81) states that "the Indians are said to be improved by the mixture." In 1890, W. H. Clark (Johns Hopk. Univ. Circ., x, no. 84, 28) says of the Gay Head Indians: "Although one observes much that betokens the Indian type, the admixture of negro and white blood has materially changed them." The deportation of the Pequot to the Bermudas after the defeat of 1638 may have led to admixture there. The Pequot of Groton, Conn., who in 1832 numbered but 40, were reported as considerably mixed with white and negro blood, and the condition of the few representatives of the Paugusset of Milford in 1849 was about the same (De Forest, Hist. Inds. Conn., 356, 1853). Of the Indians in Ledyard we read (ibid., 445): "None of the pure Pequot race are left, all being mixed with Indians of other tribes or with whites and negroes." Long Island presents another point of Indian-negro admixture. Of the Shinnecock on the s. shore, Gatschet in 1889 (Am. Antiq., xi, 390, 1889) observes: "There are 150 individuals now going under this name, but they are nearly all mixed with negro blood, dating from the times of slavery in the Northern states." Still later M. R. Harrington (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, xvi, 37, 1903) notes the occurrence in many individuals of both Indian and negro somatic characters. These Shinnecock evidently have not been so completely Africanized as some authorities believe. The remnant of the Montauk in East Hampton are reported by W. W. Tooker (Ind. Place-names, iv, 1889) to be mixed with negroes, though still recognizable by their aboriginal features. The region of Chesapeake bay furnishes evidences of Indian-negro intermixture. The fact, pointed out by Brinton (Am. Antiq., ix, 352, 1887), that the list of the numerals 1-10 given as Nanticoke in a manuscript of Pyrlaus, the missionary to the Mohawk, dating from 1780, is really Mandingo or a closely related African language, indicates contact or intermixture. Of the Pamunkey and Mattaponi of Virginia, Col. Aylett (Rep. Ind., U. S. Census 1890, 602) states that there has been a considerable mixture of white and negro blood, principally the former. Traces of Indian blood are noticeable, according to G. A. Townsend (Scribner's Mag., no. 72, 518, 1871), in many of the freeborn negroes of the e. shore of Maryland. According to Mooney (Am. Anthropol., iii, 132, 1890), "there is not now a native full-blood Indian speaking his own language from Delaware bay to Pamlico sound," those who claim to be Indians having much negro blood. We find not only Indian-negro intermixture, but also the practice of negro slavery among the Indians of the s. Atlantic and Gulf states. The Melungeons of Hancock co., Tenn., but formerly resident in North Carolina, are said to be "a mixture of white, Indian, and negro" (Am. Anthropol., ii, 347, 1889). The so-called Croatan (q. v.) of North Carolina and Redbones of South Carolina seem to be of the same mixture. The holding of negro slaves by the tribes of the Carolinas led to considerable intermarriage. There has been much negro admixture among the Seminole from an early period, although the remnant still living in Florida is of comparatively pure Indian blood. Of the other Indians of Muskogean stock the Creeks seem to have most miscegenation, fully one-third of the tribe having perceptible negro admixture. In the time of De Soto a "queen" of the Yuchi ran away with one of his negro slaves. Estevanico, the famous companion of Cabeza de Vaca, the explorer, in 1528-36, was a negro, and the importance of negro companions of Spanish explorers has been discussed by Wright (Am. Anthropol., iv, 217-28, 1902). Of Algonquian peoples the Shawnee, and the Chippewa of Minnesota, etc., furnish some cases of Indian-negro intermarriage—the fathers negro, the mothers Indian. The Canadian Tuscarora of the Iroquoian stock are said to have some little negro blood among them, and Grinnell reports a few persons of evident negro blood among the Piegan and Kainah. Some of the Indian tribes of the plains and the far W. have taken a dislike to the negro, and he often figures to disadvantage in their myths and legends. Marcy, in 1853, reports this of the Comanche, and in 1891 the present writer found it true to a certain extent of the Kutenai of s. e. British Columbia. Nevertheless, a few cases of intermarriage are reported from this region. The Caddo, former residents of Louisiana and e. Texas, appear to have much negro blood, and on the other hand it is probable that many of the negroes of the whole lower Atlantic and Gulf region have much of Indian blood. Lewis and Clark reported that some of the N. W. Indians, for mysterious reasons, got their negro servant to consort with the Indian women, so much were they taken with him. According to Swanton the richest man among the Skidgate Haida is a negro. In the Indian-negro half-breed, as a rule, the negro type of features seems to predominate. The relation of the folklore of the negroes in America to that of the American aborigines has been the subject of not a little discussion. In regard to the "Uncle Remus" stories, Crane (Pop. Sci. Mo., xviii, 324-33, 1881) and Gerber (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, vi, 245-57, 1893) assume the African origin of practically all these myths, and hold that such borrowing as has taken place has been from the negroes by the Indians. Powell (Harris, Uncle Remus, introd., 1895) and Mooney (19th Rep. B. A. E., 232-34, 1900) entertain the opinion that a considerable portion of the myths in question are indigenous with the Indians of s. e. United States. The latter points out that "in all the southern colonies Indian slaves were bought and sold and kept in servitude and worked in the fields side by side with negroes up to the time of the Revolution." The conservatism of the Indian and his dislike or contempt for the negro must have prevented his borrowing much, while the imitateness of the latter and his love for comic stories led him, Mooney thinks, to absorb a good deal from the Indian. He also holds that the idea that such stories are necessarily of negro origin is due largely to the common but mistaken notion that the Indian has no sense of humor.

Negro Town. A village mentioned in 1836 as near Withlacoochee r., Fla., and burned in that year by the Americans (Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 4, 135, 1848). It was probably occupied by runaway slaves and Seminole.

Negusset. A former village, probably of the Abnaki, about the site of Woolwich, Me. The site was sold in 1639.

Negwagon. A chief of the Ottawa of the Michilimackinac region of Michigan, commonly known as Little Wing, or Wing, and also called Ningweegon. Although the United States had declined the proffer of Indian services in the war with Great Britain in 1812, Negwagon espoused the American cause and lost a son in battle, whereupon he adopted Austin E. Wing. When the British took possession of Michilimackinac, Negwagon retired with his people to their hunting grounds, hoisting the American flag over his camp. Happening to be alone, he was visited by British soldiers, who ordered him to strike his flag. Obeying the command, he wound the emblem around his arm, and, drawing his tomahawk, said to the officer, "Englishmen, Negwagon is the friend of the Americans. He has but one flag and one heart; if you take one you shall take the other!" Then sounding a war cry he assembled his warriors and was allowed to remain in peace and to hoist the flag again. After the close of the war he annually visited Detroit with his family in two large birchbark canoes with an American flag flying from the stern of each. Lewis Cass, then stationed at Detroit, never failed to reward him on the occasion of these visits with two new flags. By treaty of Mar. 28, 1836, he was granted an annuity of $100, payable in money or goods. Negwagon is described as having been very large in stature. A county of Michigan was named in his honor, but the name was subsequently changed. Consult Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., iii, 1857. (C. T.)

Nehadi (Nexa'di, 'people of Nēx'). A Tlingit division living at Sanya, Alaska, peculiar as being outside of both Tlingit phratries and able to marry into any other group. It is said to be of Tsimshian origin. (J. R. S.)

Nehalem. A Salish tribe formerly living on or near Nehalem r., in n. w. Oregon, but now on Grande Ronde r. Pop. 28 in 1871.

Neholohawee. Given by Haywood (Hist. Tenn., 276, 1823) as the name of a Cherokee clan, signifying 'blind savanna'. No such clan name or meaning exists in the tribe, and the name is evidently a bad corruption either of Ani'-kiláhi or of Ani'-Gatagewi, Cherokee clan names, the latter having a slight resemblance to the word for 'swamp' or 'savanna'.

Nehowmean.—Can. Ind. Aff., 79, 1878. N'homi'n.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899.

Nhumeen.—Can. Ind. Aff., 1892, 312, 1893.

Nehomeen.—Brit. Col. Map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872. Nx'ōmī'n.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 172, 1900.

Neihahat. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned by Joutel in 1689 (Margry, Déc., III, 409, 1878) as an ally of the Kadohadacho.

Neiuningaitua. A settlement of the Aivilirmiut Eskimo on an island n. of the entrance to Lyon inlet, at the s. end of Melville penin., Canada.

Neyūning-Eit-dūā.—Parry, Second Voy., 162, 1824. Winter Island.—Ibid.

Nekah (N'ka, 'goose'). A gens of the Chippewa.

Ne-kah.—Warren, Hist. Ojibways, 45, 1885.

N'ka.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906.

Nekoubaniste. A tribe, probably Montagnais, formerly living n. w. of L. St John, Quebec.

Neconbavistes.—Lattre, map, 1784 (misprint).

Nekoubanistes.—Bellin, map, 1755; Alcedo, Dic. Geog., III, 28, 290; IV, 210, 1788. Neloubanistes.—Esnauls and Rappilly, map, 1777 (misprint).

Nekunsisnis ('round isle'). A former Chitimacha village opposite Ile aux Oiseaux, in Lac de la Fausse Pointe, La.

Ne'kun si'nis.—Gatschet in Trans. Anthropol. Soc. Wash., II, 152, 1893.

Nekun-stustai (N'ku'n stastā'-i, 'the Stustas of Naikun'). A subdivision of the Stustas, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida (q. v.). As their name implies, they lived near the great sand point called Naikun, or Rose spit.

(J. R. S.)

Na'ku'n stastai'.—Boas in 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. N'ku'n stastā'-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Nelcelchumnee. Given as one of the tribes on Fresno res., Cal., in 1861, numbering 85 (Ind. Aff. Rep., 219, 1861). Apparently the only mention of the tribe, which is presumably Moquelumnan.

Nellagottine ('people at the end of the world'). A division of the Kawchodinne, occupying the country on L. Simpson and along Anderson r., Canada, next to the Eskimo. Anderson and others (Hind, Labrador Penin., II, 260, 1863) called them half Kawchodinne and half Kutchin. Macfarlane (ibid., 259) said they erect lodges of turf on poles. Ross said in 1859 that the Kawchodinne residing in the country around Ft Good Hope extended beyond the Arctic circle on Mackenzie r., coming into contact with the Kutchin, with whom, by intermarriage, they have formed the tribe Bastard Loucheux.

Bâtard Loucheux.—Hind, Labrador Penin., II, 260, 1863. Bâtards-Loucheux.—Petitot, Dict. Dènè-Dindjé, xx, 1876. Loucheux-Batarda.—Ross, MS., B. A. E., 1859. Mnè-la-gottinè.—Petitot in Bul. Soc. Géog. Paris, chart, 1875. Mnè-lla-Gottinè.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891. Tpa-pa-Gottinè.—Ibid. (= 'ocean people'). Vieux de la Mer.—Ibid.

Nellmole. A rancheria belonging to the former Dominican mission of San Miguel de la Frontera, w. coast of Lower California, about 30 m. s. of San Diego, Cal. Its inhabitants spoke a Diegueño dialect.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 18, 1860.

Neluste (Ne-lus-te, 'the hollow leaf'). Given by Haywood (Tenn., 276, 1823) as a clan of the Cherokee. No such clan now exists, but there is some evidence of the former existence of a Cherokee clan taking its name from the holly (ustisli); the clan name would probably have been Ani'-Us'tistl'.

(J. M.)

Nemah. A former Chinook village on the site of the present town of the same name, on the E. side of Shoalwater bay, Wash.

Mar'ho.—Swan, N. W. Coast, 211, 1857. Māx.—Boas, inf'n, 1905 (Chehalis name). Nē'ma.—Ibid. (own name). Tetēmā'x.—Ibid. (Chehalis name for the villagers).

Nemalquinner. A Chinookan tribe, belonging to the Cushook division (q. v.) of Lewis and Clark, which lived in 1806 at the falls of the Willamette, in Oregon, but also had a temporary house on the n. end of Sauvie id., where they went occasionally to collect wappatoo. They numbered 200, in 4 houses.—Lewis and Clark Exped., II, 219, 1814.

Nemalquinner.—Lewis and Clark Exped., II, 219, 1814. Ne-mal-quin-ner's.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, VI, 116, 1905.

Nemoy. Noted as a Snake band at the head of Madison r., Mont., one of the head forks of the Missouri. This would place the band in Tukuarika territory, though the name is not identified with any known division.

Ne-moy.—Lewis and Clark Exped., I, map, 1814.

Nenabozho. See Nanabozho.

Nenekunat. See Ninigret.

Nenelkyenok (N'ēnēl'k'ēnōx, 'people from the headwaters of the river'). A gens of the Nimkish, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 331, 1897.

Nenelpae (N'ēnēl'pae, 'those on the upper end of the river'). A gens of the Kocksotenok, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 330, 1897.

Nennequi. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Nenohuttahe. See Path Killer.

Nenoothlect (Ne-nooth-lect). A former Chinookan tribe living 28 m. from The Dalles, on Columbia r., Oreg.—Lee and Frost, Oregon, 176, 1844.

Neodakheat (Ne-o'-dāk-he'-ūt, 'head of the lake'). Given by Morgan as a former Cayuga village at the head of Cayuga lake, on the site of Ithaca, N. Y. In 1750, Cammerhoff, Zeisberger's companion, called the lake there Ganiataregechiat, with the same meaning. In 1766 Zeisberger again visited the place and said a Delaware village existed at the end of the lake. Three or 4 m. off was a Tutelo village with a Cayuga chief. The Tutelo had been placed there by the Iroquois. (W. M. B.) Ne-é-dak hé-āt.—Morgan, League Iroq., 470, 1851. Oeyendehit.—Pouchot map (1758) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., x, 694, 1858 (possibly identical). O-nya'-de-s'-ka'-hyāt.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886 (Seneca form).

Neokautah (Four Legs). The Menominee name of a Winnebago chief whose village, commonly known as Four Legs Village, was situated at the point where Fox r. leaves L. Winnebago, on the site of the present Neenah, Winnebago co., Wis. According to Draper (Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., x, 114, 1888), while living here Neokautah for a time claimed tribute from Americans who passed his village. With Dekaury and other Winnebago chiefs he joined in the war against the United States in 1812-13, reaching the seat of hostilities in time to join Tecumseh in the fighting at Ft Meigs, Ohio, and later engaged in the attack on Ft Sandusky, so ably defended by Croghan (Grignon's Recollections in Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., iii, 269, 1857). Neokautah was one of the representatives of his people at the peace conference at Mackinaw, Mich., June 3, 1815, and was a signer of the treaty of Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825, under the French name "Les quatre jambes," as leading representative of his tribe. His Winnebago name is given as Hoot-shoapkau, but it seems to have been seldom used. (C. T.)

Neolithic age. A term, signifying 'new stone age,' applied originally in Europe to the culture period that followed the Paleolithic ('old stone') age and preceded the Bronze or Metal age, the separation, as the name implies, being chronologic. In northern America at the period of discovery the native culture was that of the Stone age in general, all stages of stone art being represented at one and the same time. It is thus not possible to separate the culture as a whole on a time basis, and the terms Neolithic and Paleolithic are not applicable save in a theoretical sense, i. e., on the assumption that each tribe or group of tribes that had achieved the higher stone culture had necessarily at an earlier period passed through the lower. See Antiquity. (W. H. H.)

Neomaitaneo (néomai, 'sand piled in hills'; hetā'neo, 'men, people': 'sand-hill people'). A band of the Hevipsnipahis division of the Cheyenne, so called from having formerly ranged chiefly in the "sand-hill country" of N. E. Colorado. Not identical with the Cheyenne tribe as a whole, as has been stated. (J. M.)

Néomai-tāneo.—Mooney, Cheyenne MS., B. A. E., 1906. Sand-hill people.—Grinnell in Internat. Cong. Americanists, XIII, 139, 1905.

Neomonni (Rain-cloud). An Iowa chief, of inferior grade, during the early half of the 19th century. He claimed to have taken scalps from Kansa, Omaha, Missouri, Sioux, Osage, and Sauk Indians, and Catlin (Fourteen Iowa Indians, 3, 6, 1844), who writes his name "New-mon-ya, Walking rain," says he was much more distinguished as a warrior than White Cloud (under whom he was third chief), one of the most remarkable and celebrated men of the Iowa tribe. Catlin gives Neomonni's age, about 1843, as 54 years, and describes him as nearly 6½ ft tall. He was one of the 14 Iowa who visited England with Melody in 1843, Catlin, who painted his portrait, acting as interpreter. His name appears among the signers to the treaties of Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 15, 1830, as "Niayoo Manie, Walking rain"; Ft Leavenworth, Kans., Sept. 17, 1836, as "Ne-o-mo-na, Raining cloud"; and St Louis, Mo., Nov. 23, 1837, as Ne-o-mon-ni. His portrait was also painted in Washington for the War Department by C. B. King, and is reproduced in McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, ii, 1858.

Nepanet, Tom. A Christian Nipmuc, the faithful and valued friend of the Massachusetts colonists during the King Philip war in the 17th century. The English, desirous of negotiating with the enemy for the release of certain white captives, chose Nepanet as their emissary, and although confined with others on an island in Boston harbor, he consented to undertake the mission. He started for the Indian camp, Apr. 12, 1676, and although unsuccessful in the first attempt, it was chiefly through his initiative and subsequent efforts that the family of Mr Rowlandson and other prisoners were finally released. It was also through his aid that a party of Englishmen under Capt. Henchman were enabled to surprise a body of the enemy at Weshakom ponds, near Lancaster, Mass., in May, 1676. (C. T.)

Nepawtacum. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, situated on the N. bank of the Rappahannock, in Lancaster co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Nephrite. This semiprecious stone, called also jade, was employed by the native tribes of British Columbia and Alaska in the manufacture of implements. Deposits of the stone were found in 1890 by Lieut. Stoney in what is now called the Jade mts., which lie N. of Kowak r., Alaska, 150 m. above its mouth; and bowlders and erratic fragments have been discovered in lower Fraser valley and at other points in British Columbia and Alaska—facts indicating a wide distribution of the material. Nephrite has not been found, however, so far as known, within the area of the United States proper, with the exception of an erratic bowlder of mottled leek-green color, weighing 47 lbs., obtained by a prospector in auriferous gravels in s. Oregon, and a small pebble from the shores of Puget sd. (Terry). It is usually found associated with metamorphic rocks, but the exact manner of its occurrence is not understood. It is not quite as hard as quartz, but on account of its compact, fibrous structure it is extremely tough and therefore makes very serviceable implements. Though not always fine-grained, nephrite takes a high polish and presents a very handsome appearance. The colors range through various shades of gray, grayish, and olive greens, bright greens, to brownish and blackish hues. It is often streaked and mottled, and is sometimes more or less translucent. Before the introduction of iron in the N. W. nephrite was much employed for hammers, adzes, drills, knives, whetstones, etc., but it seems rarely to have been used for ornaments; and there is no reason for believing that, as in the S., it had any special or mythologic significance. As the stone is too tough to be readily shaped by fracturing, it was divided by sawing—usually, it is believed, with strips of wood used in conjunction with sharp sand. Many of the specimens in our museums show traces of such treatment. The implements were finished by grinding, and sometimes were highly polished. Specimens have been obtained mainly from the coast tribes between Puget sd. in the s. and Point Barrow in the n.; but many are not fully identified as nephrite, and a considerable number are probably pectolite (q. v.). The sources of nephrite and related minerals found in use by the natives has been much discussed, since until recently no deposits had been discovered in America, and it was surmised that the northern specimens might have been brought from Siberia, and the Mexican and Central American from China; but this view is now practically abandoned. Analysis of the northern nephrites gives silica 56 to 58; magnesia, 20 to 22; lime, 11 to 14; oxide of iron, 5 to 8; aluminum, 1 to 3; specific gravity, 2.9 to 3.

For an account of the nephrites and related minerals of British Columbia, consult Dawson in Canadian Rec. of Sci., II, no. 6, 1887. For the Alaskan nephrites see Clark in Am. Jour. Sci., 3d s., xxviii, 1884; Clark and Merrill in Proc. Nat. Mus., 1888, vi, 1889; Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. F., 1890; Smith in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., iv, Anthropol., iii, 1903; Terry in Science, Jan. 3, 1890; Wilson in Rep. Nat. Mus., 1896, 1898. (W. H. H.)

Neponset. A former important Massachusetts village on Neponset r. about the present Stoughton, Norfolk co., Mass. John Eliot labored there as a missionary in 1646, and it was one of several temporary residences of Chickataubut, chief of the Massachusetts.

Chickataubut.—Hoyt, Antiq. Researches, 32, 1824 (sachem's name). Neponsett.—Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., III, 325, note, 1856. Narponset.—Hubbard (1680), ibid., 2d s., v, 32, 1815. Neponsett.—Holmes, ibid., 1st s., VII, 9, 1801. Neponset.—Pincheon (1633), ibid., 2d s., VIII, 232, 1819. Neponsitt.—Gookin (1674), ibid., 1st s., I, 148, 1806.

Nererahhe. A civil or peace chief of that part of the Shawnee living on the Scioto in Ohio, present at the conference between Sir Wm. Johnson and the representatives of the Six Nations at Johnson's Hall, N. Y., in Apr., 1774. He appears to have possessed considerable oratorical power, and at this conference made a strong appeal to the Miami representatives to follow Johnson's advice and remain friendly to the English. Rittenber (Tribes Hudson R., 306, 1872) mentions him as one of the two or three more prominent chiefs of the Shawnee at that period. Sowanowane, who, Rittenber thinks, was Cornstalk, was head or war chief of the Shawnee, and when a belt was given to Nererahhe in 1774, he sent it to Sowanowane. (C. T.)

Neron. The "captain general" of the Iroquois, taken near Montreal in 1663, and so called by the French because of his great cruelty. In memory of his brother he had burned 80 captives, besides killing 60 men with his own hand (Jes. Rel., 1656, 1663). He was an Onondaga named Aharihon, suggesting his French name. (W. M. B.)

Nesadi (N̄sa'di, 'salt-water people'). A division of the Wolf phratry of the Tlingit, living at Kake, Alaska. (J. R. S.)

Nesaquake. (From Nes̄-saq̄-auke, 'land of the second outlet,' i. e., Nesaquake r.—Rittenber). A settlement to which the Matinecoc retired after the war of 1643, at the present Nissequague, and Nesaquake r., about Smithtown, Suffolk co., Long Id., N. Y.

Nissaquogues.—Rittenber, Tribes Hudson R., 74, 1872. Nassaquakes.—Clark, Onondaga, I, 18, 1849. Neceaquake.—Doc. of 1649 quoted by Thompson, Long Id., I, 255, 1843. Neersaquake.—Ibid. Nesaquack.—Andros, 1677, in N. Y., II, 164, 1829 (misprint). Nisackqueghacky.—Doc. of 1645 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIV, 60, 1883. Nissaquague.—Wood, quoted by Macanley, N. Y., II, 252, 1829. Nissaquogue.—Thompson, Long Id., I, 94, 1843. Nissequake.—Doc. of 1666 quoted by Thompson, ibid., 28, 1843. Nissequogue.—Thompson, ibid., I, 46, 1843. Wissiquack.—Doc. of 1704 quoted by Rittenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 93, 1906.

NescambioÛit. See Asiacumbuit.

Nescopeck. A mixed Iroquois, Shawnee, and Delaware village formerly at the mouth of Nescopeck r., in Luzerne co., Pa., where a town of the same name now stands. It had been abandoned by 1779.

(J. N. B. H.)

Neshamini. A Delaware tribe or band formerly living on Neshaminy cr., Bucks co., Pa.

Neshamani.—Clay quoted by Day, Penn., 485, 1843. Neshaminas.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 127, 1816. Ne-sham-i-nes.—Macauley, N. Y., II, 166, 1829. Neshaminies.—Proud, Penn., II, 294, 1798. Nishaminies.—Sanford, U. S., cxlvii, 1819.

Neshannock. A white-fleshed variety of potato; from the name of the place in Pennsylvania, where it was first produced. Neshannock, the name of a village and stream in Mercer co., comes from a word in the Delaware dialect of Algonquian, signifying 'place of two rivers', from nisha 'two', -hanne 'flowing stream', -ock locative suffix.

(A. F. C.)

Neshasath (Ne'c'asath). A sept of the Seshart, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Neshaw. A local word for eel in Massachusetts. Trumbull (Natick Dict., 80, 1903) says: "The name of 'neshaw eel' is yet retained by the fishermen of Martha's Vineyard and perhaps elsewhere in Massachusetts for the silver eel (Muraena argentea). The derivation is from Narraganset neeshañog 'eels', literally 'pairers', from nees 'two', ñog 'they go to'. This Algonquian name, Trumbull thinks, may have belonged originally to the lamprey.

(A. F. C.)

Nesheptanga. An ancient ruined pueblo situated in Jedith valley, in the Hopi country, S. E. Arizona. It seemingly was one of the group of villages built and occupied by the Kawaika people, who were of Keresan stock from the Rio Grande. It was first described, but not named, by V. Mindeleff in 1885 as a ruin between the Bat House (Chakpahu) and the Horn House (Kokopnyama), and was partially excavated by Dr Walter Hough for the National Museum in 1901. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 50-51, 1891; Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 590, 1898; Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 333 et seq., 1903.

Neshepatanga.—Hough, op. cit., pl. 82.

Neshta. An extinct subgens of the Wazhazhe gens of the Ponca.

Necta.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 229, 1897 (c-sh).

Nesietsha. A Naskotin village at the confluence of Blackwater and Fraser rs., Brit. Col.

Black Water.—Morice, Notes on W. Déné, 24, 1893.

Nesietshah.—Morice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., 109, 1892.

Nesikeep ('little deep hollow or cut', according to Teit; 'destroyed', referring to the incidents of a story, according to Hill-Tout). A village belonging to the Upper Fraser band of Ntlakyapamuk, on the w. side of Fraser r., 38 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col. Pop. 12 in 1901, the last time the name was officially reported. Dawson gives this as a Lillooet town.

N'ock'p't.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Nesikeep.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 166, 1901. Nes-i-kip.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 44, 1891. Nesyeep.—Can. Ind. Nesquehonite. A variety of magnesium carbonate, from Nesquehoning, the place in Pennsylvania where it was found, and -ite, representing the Greek ίτος. Nesquehoning, the name of a stream and village in Carbon co., signifies, in the Delaware dialect of Algonquian, 'at the black deer lick,' from nisque 'black', mahoni 'deer lick', -ing locative suffix. (A. F. C.)

Nestucca. A branch of the Tillamook, formerly living on and near Nestugga r., N. W. Oreg., now on the Grande Ronde and Siletz res. Their popular name is derived from that of their country; their own name is Stagā'ush ('people of Staga'). Pop. 46 in 1881. They are no longer separately enumerated.

Apáfan.—Gatschet, Kalapuya MS., B. A. E., 30 (Atfalati name for the Oregon Salish; perhaps from tehápáfan, 'on the coast'). Nas-tū'-kin-me'junnō.—Dorsey, MS. Nesutan, Job. One of the Indians chosen by John Eliot to assist him, as interpreter, in translating the Scriptures into the Natick language of Massachusetts. Gookin (Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 444, 1836) thus speaks of him: "In this expedition [July, 1675] one of our principal soldiers of the praying Indians was slain, a valiant and stout man named Job Nesutan; he was a very good linguist in the English tongue and was Mr Eliot's assistant and interpreter in his translations of the Bible, and other books of the Indian language." Eliot wrote, Oct. 21, 1650: "I have one [Indian interpreter] already who can write, so that I can read his writing well, and with some pains and teaching, can read mine" (Pilling, Algonq. Bib., 127, 1891).

Neswage. A Delaware chief who, commanding a band of 23 warriors, about 1841, was attacked by the Sioux at a point just N. of the present Adel, Dallas co., Ia., while on their way to visit the Sauk and Foxes, then holding a war dance within the limits of the site of Des Moines. The Delawares offered a brave defense, killing 26 of the Sioux before all but one of their own number fell. This survivor bore the news to the camp of the Sauk and Foxes, a short distance away, among whom were Keokuk and Pashapahs. With 600 warriors they followed the Sioux, inflicting on them severe punishment. Those who visited the scene of the attack on the Delawares found the body of Neswage lying by a tree, his tomahawk at his side and the bodies of four of his warriors immediately about him. Netawatwees. A Delaware chief, born about 1677, died at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1776. Netawatwees was one of the signers of the treaty of Conestoga in 1718. As he belonged to the important Unami, or Turtle division of the tribe, he became chief of this division according to usage and in consequence thereof head chief of the tribe. To him were committed all the tokens of contracts, such as wampum belts, obligatory writings, with the sign manual of William Penn and others down to the time that he and his people were forced to leave Pennsylvania and retire to Ohio, where they settled on Cayuga r. He failed to attend the treaty with Bouquet in 1763, and when this officer and Bradstreet with their troops approached his settlement he attempted to escape, but was captured and deposed from his chieftancy until the conclusion of peace, when he was reinstated by his tribe. He became a convert to Christianity in his later years and urged other leaders to follow his example. On his death he was succeeded by White Eyes. (W. R. G.)

Netchilirmiut ('people of the place possessing seal'). A large tribe of the Central Eskimo, occupying Boothia Felix, Canada, and the adjoining mainland, in lat. 70°. They have become mixed with the Ugjulirmiut. Their villages are Angmalortuk, Netchilik, North Herndon, and Sagavok. In recent years a large part of the tribe has moved to Hudson bay and lives in the region between C. Fullerton and Repulse bay.

Netop. The word netop, used by the English, according to Roger Williams, in saluting the Indians, is a slight corruption of Narraganset netomp (= nitamp for nitappan), cognate with Abnaki nidaubé and southern Renape nidāpen (netoppew, Smith), usually interpreted 'my friend,' but meaning, literally, 'my with-man,' i. e., 'my companion.' The words are contracted, respectively, from nē 'my' + wit 'with' (which loses its w in composition) + -ap(en) 'man'; nē + wid + -āpē; and nē + wit + -āpen. Contractions of this kind are not uncommon in Algonquian; for example: Nipissing nitshikoc, 'my female companion,' lit. 'my co-woman', from ni 'my' + witsh 'with' + -ikoc 'woman'; Chippewa nidji 'my comrade', from ni + widj + i, 'my co-as-I' (or as myself); Delaware nitia 'my friend' or 'companion', from ni + wit + is; Cree nit-wāim 'my companion,' lit. 'my with-goer.' Cf. Lat. comes, 'companion,' lit. 'with-goer.' (W. R. G.)

Nets, Netting, and Network. In every part of the United States and northward the Indians and the Eskimo used some kind of nets, netting, or network. These were made from animal tissues and vegetal fibers—wool and hair, hide, sinew, and intestines; roots, stems, bast, bark, and leaves. Animal skins were cut into long delicate strips, while sinew and vegetal fibers were separated into filaments and these twisted, twined, or braided and made into openwork meshes by a series of technical processes ranging from the simplest weaving or coiling without foundation to regular knotting. The woman's hands were the most useful implements in net making; but the seine needle, or shuttle, exhibits a variety of forms from the mere stick for winding, as on a bobbin, to the elaborately ornamented needles of the Eskimo. The meshing also shows a variety of processes, through more and more intricate loopings, as in the Maidu netted caps, to the world-wide netting knot (Dixon).

Netting was used for the capture of animals, for the lacings of snowshoes and lacrosse sticks, for carrying-frames and wallets, for netted caps, for the foundation of feather work—in short, for whatever had meshes. Nets for the capture of animals differed with the creatures caught, as bird net, fish net, seal net, crab net; with the form, as rectangular net, circular net, conical net, bag net, or purse net; with the function, as inclosing net, drag net, casting net, dip net, gill net, arresting net, drift net, and hand net.

Beginning at the far N. with the Eskimo, the question of tribal distribution may be considered. Not all the Eskimo used nets for fishing. Boas never saw any among the Central Eskimo, but mentions them as existing in Labrador and westward of Hudson bay; while Murdoch's account of netting at Pt Barrow, Alaska, is full. Netting needles of antler and walrus ivory, and mesh sticks of bone or antler were employed, both of peculiar patterns. The materials are sinew twine (generally braided), rawhide thong, and whalebone. The knot is the usual becket hitch. Small seal are caught in large meshed nets of rawhide, 18 meshes long and 12 deep, with length of mesh 14 in. These nets are set under the ice in winter and in shoal water in summer. Seals are enticed into the nets by whistling, by scratching on the ice, or with rattles. Whitefish are taken in gill nets set under the ice in rivers. A specimen in the National Museum, made of fine strips of whalebone, is 79 meshes long by 21 deep, with meshes $3\frac{1}{2}$ in. deep. Murdoch, who figures a conical dip net, or fish trap, made of twisted sinew, also gives the spread of various kinds of fish nets, and surmises that the American Eskimo learned the use of the net from the Siberians.

From native two-strand twine of milkweed and wild hemp fiber the Maidu of California made their nets and netted caps. Fishing nets varied in size, shape, fineness of twine, and in mesh. The Maidu of Sacramento r. used seines, those of the mountains the conical dip net. The knitting was done with a shuttle composed of two slender sticks. The first two or three fingers of the left hand served for mesh stick, and the so-called weaver's knot joined the meshes. Dixon figures and describes the several ways of making the Maidu netted caps, the simplest beginning with the plain coil without foundation, passing through the same coil with a twist or two in it, to the openwork single knot.

Going southward to the California tribes nearer the Mexican border, aboriginal netting is found in both clothing and basketry. In nets of the simplest structure the courses merely hook into one another and resemble coiled basketry, if the foundation be removed. By taking additional half turns and by varying the knotting, artistic patterns are produced. From the simple meshes the work becomes more elaborate and the knots more intricate.

An interesting use of netting has been brought to light by Holmes in his studies of ancient American pottery. In many places have been found vessels and sherds that show net impressions on the surface. In some parts of the Atlantic slope vessels of clay were molded in network, taking the impressions of the texture. In the description of ancient garments, especially those in which feathers bore a conspicuous part, precisely the same methods of netting are described. This furnishes to archeologists an excellent check-off in their studies, since in later times all other forms of textile work, excepting the figure weaving, were abandoned.

Neusiok. An unclassified tribe, perhaps of Iroquoian stock, found in 1584 occupying the country on the s. side of lower Neuse r., within the present Craven and Carteret cos., N. C. They were at war with the more southerly coast tribes. In the later colonial period the Indians of the same region were commonly known as Neuse Indians and had dwindled by the year 1700 to 15 warriors in two towns, Chattooka and Rouconk. They probably disappeared by incorporation with the Tuscarora. (J. M.)

Neutrals. An important confederation of Iroquoian tribes living in the 17th century s. of L. Erie in Ontario, having four villages E. of Niagara r. on territory extending to the Genesee watershed; the western bounds of these tribes were indefinitely w. of Detroit r. and L. St. Clair. They were called Neutrals by the French because they were neutral in the known wars between the Iroquois and the Hurons. The Hurons called them Attiwandaronk, denoting 'they are those whose language is awry', and this name was also applied by the Neutrals in turn to the Hurons. The Iroquois called them Atirhagenrat Atirhagnenrek and Rha-genratka. The Aondironon, the Wenrehronon, and the Ongniaahrar-non are names of some of the constituent tribes of the Neutrals. Champlain, reporting what he saw in 1616, wrote that the "Nation Neutre" had 4,000 warriors and inhabited a country that extended 80 or 100 leagues E. and W., situated westward from the lake of the Seneca; they aided the Ottawa Chicaux, referred against the Mascoutens or "Small Prairie people," and raised a great quantity of good tobacco, the surplus of which was traded for skins, furs, and porcupine quills and quillwork with the northern Algonquian peoples. This writer said that the Indians cleared the land "with great pains, though they had no proper instruments to do this." They burned off all the limbs from the trees, which they burned at the foot of the trees to cause them to die. Then they threw a large prepared log, the ground between the trees and planted their grain from step to step, putting in each row about 10 grains, and so continued planting until they had enough for 3 or 4 years' provisions, and a bad year, sterile and fruitless, killed them.

The Rev. Father Joseph de la Roche Dailhon, a Recollect, spent the winter of 1626 among this people for the purpose of teaching them Christianity. The first village, Kandoucho, or All Saints, welcomed him. He then went through four other villages, meeting with a friendly reception, and finally reached the sixth, where he had been told to establish himself. He had the villagers call a council of the tribe for the purpose of declaring to them his mission. He was adopted by the tribe, being given to Tsohahissen (Souharissen?), the presiding chief. Dailhon says of the Neutrals: "They are inviolable observers of what they have once concluded and decreed." His "father and host," Tsohahissen, had ever traveled among all neighboring tribes, for he was chief not only of his own village, but even of those of the whole tribe, composed of about 28 villages, villas, and towns, constructed like those of the Hurons, besides many hamlets of 7 or 8 lodges for fishing, hunting, or for the cultivation of the soil. Dailhon said that there was then no known instance of a chief so absolute; that Tsohahissen had acquired his position and power by his courage and from having been at war many times against 17 tribes, and had brought back heads (scalps?) and prisoners from all. Their arms were only the war club and the bow and arrow, but they were skilful in their use. Dailhon also remarked that he had not found in all the countries visited by him among the Indians a hunchback, one-eyed, or deformed person.

But the Hurons, having learned that Father Dailhon contemplated conducting the Neutrals to the trading place in the harbor of C. Victory in L. St. Peter of St. Lawrence r., approximately 50 m. below Montreal, spread false reports about him, declaring to the Neutrals that he was a great magician, capable of filling the air of the country with pestilence, and that he had then already taken off many Hurons by poison, thus seeking to compass his death by fomenting suspicions against him. The bearing of the accusation may be judged when it is known that sorcerers were regarded as public enemies and outlaws and were remorselessly slain on the slightest pretext.

The father declared that there were an immense number of deer in the country, which they did not take one by one; but by making a triangular "drive," composed of two convergent hedges leading to a narrow opening, with a third hedge placed athwart the opening but admitting of egress at each end of the last one, they drove the game into this pen and slaughtered them with ease. They practised toward all animals the policy that, whether they could or not, they must kill, and they were careful lest those which were not taken would tell the other beasts that they themselves had been pursued, and that these latter in time of need would not permit themselves to be taken. There were also many elk, beaver, wildcats, black squirrels, bustards, turkeys, cranes, bitterns, and other birds and animals, most of which were there all winter; the rivers and lakes were abundantly supplied with fish, and the land produced good maize, much more than the people required; there were also squashes, beans, and other vegetables in season. They made oil from the seeds of the sunflower, which the girls reduced to meal and then placed in boiling water which caused the oil to float; it was then skimmed with wooden spoons. The mush was afterward made into cakes and formed a very palatable food.

Daillon said that the life of the Neutrals was "not less indecent" than that of the Hurons, and that their customs and manners were very much the same. Like those of the Hurons, the lodges of the Neutrals were formed like arbors or bowers, covered with the bark of trees, 25 to 30 fathoms long and 6 to 8 in breadth, and had a passage running through the middle, 10 or 12 ft wide, from one end to the other. Along the sides was a kind of shelf, 4 ft from the ground, whereon the occupants lay in summer to avoid the fleas. In winter they lay on mats on the ground near the fire. Such a lodge contained about 12 fires and 24 firesides. Like the Hurons they removed their villages every 5, 10, 15, or 20 years, from 1 to 3 or more leagues, when the land became exhausted by cultivation; for as they did not make use of manure to any great degree, they had to clear more new and fertile land elsewhere. Their garments were made from the skins of various wild beasts obtained by the chase or through trade with the Algonkin, Nipissing, and other hunting tribes, for maize, meal, wampum, and fishing tackle.

The Seneca attacked and destroyed a town of the Aondironon in 1647. This seemingly unprovoked invasion was undertaken to avenge the capture among the Aondironon by the Hurons and the subsequent death of a Seneca warrior who had been among the Tionontati for the purpose of committing murder. This seeming rupture of the traditional neutrality existing between the Iroquois and the Neutrals caused the latter to prepare for war, and for a time both sides were on the alert and stood defiant. Finally the Neutrals decided to attempt to recover their captives by some peaceable means, and to await a more favorable opportunity to avenge themselves for this loss. But the sudden and complete destruction of the political integrity of the Hurons by their several defeats in 1648-

49 by the Iroquois caused the Neutrals now to fear the rising power of the Iroquois tribes, and they vainly sought to gain their good will by committing an act of hostility against their unfortunate Huron neighbors. When the Iroquois had sacked the most strongly palisaded towns of the Hurons, the Huron fugitives sought asylum in all directions, and many of them, placing their trust in the long-standing neutrality existing between the Iroquois and the Neutrals, which neither had yet sought to rupture, fled to the Neutral towns for refuge; but instead of affording them protection, the Neutrals seized them as prisoners, and also that portion of the Hurons still remaining in their own country, and led them into captivity (Jes. Rel. 1659-60).

Immediately after the political destruction of the Hurons by the Iroquois the latter again attacked the Neutrals. The entire conquest of the Neutrals in 1650-51 was the result of this war, and some remnants of the Neutral tribes were incorporated chiefly with the Seneca villages in New York.

The Neutrals were visited in 1640-41 by Fathers Brebeuf and Chaumonot. The tribe was then engaged in vigorous war against the western tribes, especially the Mascoutens. These two missionaries visited 18 villages or towns, stopping in 10 of them and expounding their own religious faith whenever they could assemble an audience. In these 10 settlements they estimated about 500 fires and 3,000 persons. On their return journey the fathers remained at Teotongniaton, situated midway between the chief town, Ounontisaston, and the town nearest the Huron country, Kandoucho, where they were compelled to remain on account of snow. While there their hostess was at great pains to shield them from the abuse to which they were constantly subjected; she also aided them to learn the language and to harmonize it with that of these Neutrals. The Awenrehronon, who had formerly lived eastward of the Erie or Panther tribe, took refuge in Khioetoea, or St Michel, a few years before this visit of the two fathers, and they were disposed to listen to the teachings of the missionaries.

As a sign of mourning for their friends and kin the Neutrals customarily blackened not only their own but also the faces of the dead. They tattooed the corpse and adorned it with feathers and other trinkets; if the person died in war, a chief delivered an address over the body, around which were assembled the friends and kin of the dead, who were urged by the orator to hasten to avenge the death. The Neutrals figuratively resurrected the dead, especially great chieftains and persons noted for valor and wisdom, by the substitution of some person who they thought was like the deceased in person, age, and character. The selection was made in council, by the clan of the deceased person; then all the people except the one chosen arose, and the master of ceremonies, gently lowering his hand to the earth, feigned to raise the illustrious dead from the tomb and to give life to him in the person of the chosen one, on whom he then imposed the name and dignity of the dead chieftain, and the newly made chieftain then arose amid the ceremonial acclaim of the people.

In 1643 the Neutrals sent an expedition of 2,000 warriors against the "Nation du feu," some of whom they attacked in a palisaded village defended by 900 men, who bravely withstood the first assaults; but after a siege of 10 days the Neutrals carried the palisade and killed on the spot many of its defenders and took about 800 captives. After burning 70 of the best warriors of the Nation du feu, they put out the eyes and girdled the mouths of the old men, whom they afterward abandoned to starve (Jes. Rel. 1643-44). The same authority also says that the Nation du feu alone was more populous than all the Neutral nation, all the Hurons, and all the Iroquois, showing that the term had not yet become restricted to those now called Mascoutens, or "Small Prairie people," but included all the so-called Illinois tribes as well.

From the Journal des PP. Jesuites for 1652-53 it is learned that the portions of the Tobacco Nation and of the Neutral Nation then remaining independent bodies of people were assembling with all neighboring Algonquian tribes at A'otonatendie (Akotonatendike?), situated 3 days' journey southward from Skia'e (Sault Sainte Marie); that the Tobacco Nation wintered in 1653 at Tea'on-to'rai, and the Neutrals, numbering 800, at Sken'chio'e (i. e., Fox place) in the direction of Te'o'chanontian, probably Detroit; that these two tribes would rendezvous in the autumn of 1653 at A'otonatendie, where they had assembled more than 2,000 warriors. This is perhaps the last historical mention of the Neutrals as an independent body. It is these Neutrals, apparently, whom Perrot (Mémoire, chap. xiv, 1864) calls "Huron de la nation neutre" and "Hurons neutres."

In 1640 the Hurons offered a present of 9 hatchets (costly articles at that time) to the chieftains of the Neutral council, in the hope of inducing it to order the assassination of Fathers Brebeuf and Chaumonot, but after deliberating on the proposal all night the council refused to accept the gift.

As has been seen, Daillon said the Neutrals occupied 28 villages in 1626. In 1640 Brebeuf ascribed to them 40 villages with a minimum population of 12,000 persons, including 4,000 warriors. Only a few of the names of these have been preserved, among them being Kandoucho or Tous les Saints, Khioetia or Saint Michel, Ongniaahra ("Ouaroron," probably on the site of Youngstown, N. Y.; a form of Niagara), Ounontisaston, and Teotongniaton or Saint Guillaume. (J. N. B. H.)

Nevome. A name applied to the Lower Pima, or Pimas Bajos, living chiefly in Sonora, Mexico, including the middle Yaqui r. region and extending E. somewhat into Chihuahua. They are now almost completely assimilated with the whites, the Nevome ("Pima") population in Sonora and Chihuahua being officially given as only 528 in 1900. Under the same term may be included also one or two small colonies; one known as the Bamoa (q. v.) and the other a former settlement in the Tepehuane territory. The language of the two divisions of the Pima tribe, Upper and Lower, is substantially the same, and there are no marked differences in their physical characteristics; they are generally tall, robust, and well-formed. Their skulls are dolichocephalic. According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 54, 1890) their social organization and their religious beliefs and practices were analogous to those of the Yaqui. They were described by Ribas, a missionary of the 17th century, as "on the banks of creeks with good running water, their houses better and more durable than those of neighboring tribes, the walls being formed of large adobes and the roofs flat and covered with earth. Some of their houses were much larger than others and furnished with loopholes like forts, in which the people could take refuge in times of danger." Lamholtz (Unknown Mexico, I, 127, 1902) says they often have connected with their houses a kind of

outside cellar, covered with a conical roof of dry grass, which serves both as a work-room and as a storeroom for their stock in trade. Like all the converted Indians of this section it is common at the present day for them to fix small crosses in a log and plant them in front of their houses. Their chief and most formidable enemies in former times were the Apache. The divisions of the Nevome, usually so called from the names of the villages at various periods, are: Alvino, Basima, Buena Vista, Cumuripa, Ecatauri, Hecatari, Hio, Huvaguere, Maicoba, Moicahui, Movas, Nuri, Onavas, Onopa, Otimuri, San Antonio de la Huerta, San José de los Pimas, Sibuhapa, Sisibotari, Soyopa, Suahui, Tecuripa Tehata, Tehuizo, Tonichi, Ures (in part), and Yecora. The with mounds, ditches, and connecting avenues spreading over nearly 4 sq. m. A number of the minor structures have been obliterated and a large portion of the remaining walls considerably reduced by the plow. Fortunately, an accurate survey and plat were made by Col. Whittlesey in 1838 while the works were yet comparatively uninjured; and other surveys and plats were made by the Bureau of American Ethnology in 1888 and a partial survey by the U. S. Geological Survey in 1891. The works consist of two groups, nearly 2 m. apart, connected by two wall-lined avenues. The western group consists of a large circle connected with an octagon. Outside the latter, near the E. corner, there is a small circle, and near the middle of the S. side there is another. From the latter point of the octagon a walled avenue, now almost obliterated, extended directly s. 2 m. or more. From near the e. corner of the octagon two avenues extended eastward with a low wall on each side, one connecting with the square of the eastern group, the other running directly eastward to the descent to the lowland s. of the square. Along these avenues, at one or two points, are small circles. The eastern group consists of a large circle connected with a square by a broad avenue and several adjoining lines of walls. The circle of the western group, which is the westernmost structure of the entire works, is still distinct, being 3 ft high at the lowest point, and averaging 4 to 5 ft, apart from an enlargement on the s. w. side, where for about 170 ft it rises to the height of 14 ft. This enlargement has been called the "observatory," while the circle has been named "the observatory circle." At the s. e. side, directly opposite this observatory, is a gateway leading into an avenue 200 ft long and 80 ft wide, which terminates in one of the gateways of the octagon. The latter, which is symmetrical, has a gateway at each of the 8 corners, opposite which, 60 ft within, is a small mound varying in height from 3 to 6 ft. The mean diameter of the circle, measured from the middle line of the wall, is 1,054 ft. The circumference, measured along the middle of the wall, deviates at no point more than 5 ft from a true circle. The area, including the inner half of the wall, is 20 acres; that of the level interior, 18.6 acres. The parts and angles of the octagon are quite symmetrical. The length of the walls between the centers of the gates averages 621 ft, from which the greatest variation is only 4 ft, except in one wall that falls 8 ft short of the average. The opposite angles do not vary from one another more than 2 degrees in any instance, and the opposite sides do not vary from the same direction more than 2 degrees. The large circle of the eastern group embraces within its circuit the fair grounds of the Licking County Agricultural Society. The wall in this instance, is accompanied with an inside ditch, varying in width from 28 to 40 ft and in depth from 8 to 13 ft. The width of the wall at the base is from 35 to 55 ft and its height from 5 to 14 ft. There is one gateway at the s. e. with flanking extensions of the wall into the avenue leading to the square. The square of the eastern group is partially obliterated, yet most of the walls could be distinctly traced in 1888, when the survey on behalf of the Bureau of American Ethnology was made. From this survey it is learned that the sides varied in length from 926 to 951 ft and that the angles at the corners did not in any instance vary from a right angle more than 1 degree. There are now no indications of the inner mounds of the square observed by Whittlesey; but the three-pointed mound in the center of the fair-grounds circle is still visible. There were also, at the time of Whittlesey's survey, 4 or 5 circles that were smaller than those above described. The two or three of these that remain vary from 125 to 200 ft in diameter and have an inside ditch and a semicircular earthen platform on one side. There were also in Whittlesey's time several still smaller circles, which may have been lodgesites. The avenues, except the one connected with the fair-grounds circle, which was wider, were generally about 200 ft wide. Their walls at present do not exceed at any point 2 ft in height, and in many places are almost obliterated.

Newichawanoc. A tribe or band of the Pennacook confederacy living on upper Piscataqua r. Their village, of the same name, was situated about the site of Berwick, Me. They were neighbors of the Piscataqua and probably intimately related to them. Their chief is said to have joined in the deed of 1629 to Wheelwright, the genuineness of which is still a mooted question. The tribe early became extinct.

Newtown. A former village, probably of the Delawares and Iroquois, on Muskingum r., about the site of the present Newton, Muskingum co., Ohio.

Newtown. A former village, probably of the Delawares and Iroquois, on the W. side of Wills cr., near the site of the present Cambridge, Guernsey co., Ohio.

Newtychanning. A mixed Iroquois village, built in 1778 on the W. bank of Susquehanna r. and on the N. side of Sugar cr., in the vicinity of the present North Towanda, Bradford co., Pa. It was destroyed Aug. 8, 1779, by Colonel Proctor of Sullivan's army, at which time it contained 15 or 20 houses. Near this site was formerly situated the village of Osalui. (J. N. B. H.)

Nez Percés ('pierced noses'). A term applied by the French to a number of tribes which practised or were supposed to practise the custom of piercing the nose for the insertion of a piece of dentallium. The term is now used exclusively to designate the main tribe of the Shapthian family, who have not, however, so far as is known, ever been given to the practice.

The Nez Percés, or Sahaptin of later writers, the Chopunnish (corrupted from Tsútpéli) of Lewis and Clark, their discoverers, were found in 1805 occupying a large area in what is now w. Idaho, n. e. Oregon, and s. e. Washington, on lower Snake r. and its tributaries. They roamed between the Blue mts. in Oregon and the Bitter Root mts. in Idaho, and according to Lewis and Clark sometimes crossed the range to the headwaters of the Missouri. By certain writers they have been classed under two geographic divisions, Upper Nez Percés and Lower Nez Percés. The latter were found by Bonneville in 1834 to the s. and w. of the Blue mts. on several of the branches of Snake r., where they were neighbors of the Cayuse and Wallawalla. The Upper Nez Percés held the Salmon r. country in Idaho in 1834, and probably also at the same time the Grande Ronde valley in e. Oregon, but by treaty of 1855 they ceded a large part of this territory to the United States.

The reservation in which they were confined at that time included the Wallowa valley in Oregon, as well as a large district in Idaho. With the discovery of gold and the consequent influx of miners and settlers the Oregon districts were in demand, and a new treaty was made by which the tribe was confined to the reservation at Lapwai, Idaho. The occupants of Wallowa valley refused to recognize the treaty, and finally, under their chief, Joseph (q. v.), took active measures of resistance, and the Nez Percé war of 1877 resulted. Several severe defeats were inflicted on the United States troops who were sent against the Indians, and finally, when forced to give way, Joseph conducted a masterly retreat across the Bitter Root mts. and into Montana in an attempt to reach Canadian territory, but he and his band were surrounded and captured when within a few miles of the boundary. Joseph and his followers to the number of 450 were removed to Indian Ter., where their loss from disease was so great that in 1885 they were sent to the Colville res. in n. Washington, where a remnant still resides.

Under the collective name Chopunnish, Lewis and Clark estimated the population to be 7,850. Deducting from this total 1,600 for the Pelloatpallah (Paloo) band, now treated as distinct from the Nez Percés, and 250 for the Yeletpo (Wailtpe, i. e., Cayuse), now supposed to belong to a distinct stock, the total of the Nez Percés in 1805 according to those authors was about 6,000. Wilkes estimated the Chopunnish at about 3,000 in 1849, and Gibbs gave them a population of more than 1,700 in 1853. In 1885 they were estimated officially at 1,437. There are now (1906) somewhat more than 1,600, 1,534 being on the reservation in Idaho and 83 on the Colville res. in Washington.

In general habits of life the Nez Percés as well as the other Sahaptian tribes conform to the inland type of Indians and differ sharply in most respects from their western neighbors, the Chinook. At the time of Lewis and Clark's visit they are reported as living in communal houses, said to contain about 50 families each. There is evidence, however, that the Nez Percés used the typical underground lodge, and that these seldom contained more than 3 or 4 families. A much larger dancing house was built at each permanent winter camp. Salmon constituted their most important food in early times, and with roots and berries made up their entire food supply until the introduction of horses facilitated hunting expeditions to the neighboring mountains. The tribe seems to have been divided into a number of bands or villages, named according to the place where the permanent winter camp was made. Owing to the precarious nature of the food supply the greater portion of the inhabitants of any one of these villages would often be absent for a large part of the year, consequently it is impossible to determine with accuracy the location and population of these divisions in early times. There was no head chief of the tribe, but each band had several chiefs, of whom one was regarded as the leader, and these chiefs were succeeded by their sons as a rule. Expeditions for hunting or war were led by chiefs chosen for the occasion. There are no signs of a clan system in the social organization of the Nez Percés, and marriage is apparently permitted between any couple except in the case of recognized relationship.

The religious beliefs of the Nez Percés, previous to the introduction of Christianity, were those characteristic of the Indians of the interior, the main feature being the belief in an indefinite number of spirits. The individual might procure a personal protecting spirit in the usual way by rigorous training and fasting.

The Nez Percés have always borne a high reputation for independence and bravery, and have been particularly noted for their almost constant friendliness to the whites. Practically the only rupture in these relations was the Nez Percé war of 1877, mentioned above.

The bands and divisions of the Nez Percés are known only approximately. The following are the best defined: Alpowna, on a small branch of the Clearwater, below Lewiston, Idaho; Assuti, on Assuti cr., Idaho; Kamiah, at the town of that name on the Clearwater, Idaho; Lantama, so called from a branch of Salmon r., Idaho; Lapwai, near the junction of Lapwai cr. and the Clearwater; Willewah, formerly occupying Wallowa valley, Oreg., and now for the greater part on Colville res., Wash. (Joseph's band). In addition a number of bands have been recorded by the names of their chiefs or their supposed places of residence.

Niagara. Being of Iroquoian origin, one of the earliest forms of this place-name is that in the Jesuit Relation for 1641, in which it is written Ongniacahra, evidently a misprint for Ongniacahra, and it is there made the name of a Neutral town and of the river which to-day bears this designation, although Ongniarahronon of the Jesuit Relation for the year 1640 appears to be a misprint for Ongniarahronon, signifying 'people of Ongniarah.' The Iroquois and their congeners applied it to the place whereon the village of Youngstown, Niagara co., N. Y., now stands. On the Tabula Novae Francie, in Historiæ Canadensis, sive Novae-Francie (bk. 10, Paris, 1664, but made in 1660 by Franciscus Creuxius, S. J.), the falls of Niagara are called "Ongiara cataraactes." Much ingenuity has been exercised in attempts to analyze this name. The most probable derivation, however, is from the Iroquoian sentence-word, which in Onondaga and Seneca becomes Ohud'gá', and in Tuscarora U'huu'ká'r, signifying 'bisected bottom-land.' Its first use was perhaps by the Neutral or Huron tribes. (J. N. B. H.)

Niagara. A species of grape, well known in the N. E. portion of the United States; so called from its cultivation in the Niagara peninsula. Also the name of a variety of tomato, recorded in Tracy (Am. Var. of Veget. for 1901-2, Wash., 1903); from the place-name Niagara, q. v. (A. F. C.)

Niakewankih. A former village of the Clatsop on the Pacific coast, s. of Pt. Adams at the mouth of Ohanna cr., Clatsop co., Oreg. (Bous, Kathlamet Texts, 236, 1901)

Neahkwin.—Lyman in Oreg. Hist. Soc. Quar. 1, 321, 1900. Nia'k'ewankih.—Bous, Kathlamet Texts, 236, 1901

Niakla (Niak'-la). A former Chinmashan village on Santa Cruz id., Cal., E. of the harbor.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Niakonaujang. An Akudnirmint Eskimo settlement on Padli fjord, Baffin land.

Niakonaujang.—Bous in 6th Rep. B. A. E. 441, 1898.

Niantic (contr. of Niantukut, 'at a point of land on a [tidal] river or estuary' Trumbull). An Algonquian tribe formerly occupying the coast of Rhode Island from Narragansett bay to about the Connecticut state line. Their principal village, Wekapang, was on the great pond near Charlestown. They were closely connected with the Narraganset, forming practically one tribe with them. By refusing to join in King Philip's war in 1675 they preserved their territory and tribal organization, and at the close of the war the Narraganset who submitted to the English were placed with Niantic. An Algonquian tribe formerly occupying the coast of Connecticut from Niantic bay to Connecticut r. De Forest concluded that they once formed one tribe with the Rhode Island Niantic, which was cut in two by the Pequot invasion. Their principal village, also called Niantic, was near the present town of that name. They were subject to the Pequot, and had no political connection with the eastern Niantic. They were nearly destroyed in the Pequot war of 1637, and at its close the survivors were placed under the rule of the Mohegan. They numbered about 100 in 1638, and about 85 in 1761. Many joined the Brotherton Indians in New York about 1788, and none now exist under their own name. Kendall (Trav., 1809) states that they had a small village near Danbury in 1809, but these were probably a remnant of the western Connecticut tribes, not Niantic. According to Speck (inf'n, 1907) several mixed Niantic-Mohegan live at Mohegan, Conn., the descendants of a pure Niantic woman from the mouth of Niantic r. Their voices are commonly said to have been high-pitched in comparison with those of their neighbors. (J. M.)

Naihantick.—Early form cited by Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 36, 1881. Na-ticks.—Macanley, N. Y., II, 164, 1829 (incorrectly so called). Nayantaquit.—Williams (1648) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Niantilik ('with the gulls'). An Okomut Eskimo village of the Kinguinut subtribe, on Cumberland sd., Canada.

Naintilic.—Howgate, Cruise of Florence, 50, 1877. Niantilic.—Kumlien in Bull. Nat. Mus. no. 15, 15, 1879.

Nibakoa. A former village, mentioned in 1777-78, seemingly in the vicinity of Portage, Columbia co., Wis. It contained a mixed population of Chippewa and apparently of Sauk and Foxes.

Nabakoa.—Gautier (1777-78) in Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., xi, 110, 1888. Nibakoa.—Ibid., 109.

Nibowisibiwininiwak ('Death river people'). A subdivision of the Chippewa living in Saskatchewan, N. of L. Winnipeg. Cf. Ojibwese-pewenewak.

Lake Winnipeg band.—Smithson. Misc. Coll., iv, art. 6, 35, 1878. Nibowi-sibi-wininiwak.—Gatschet, Ojibwa MS., B. A. E., 1882.

Nicassias. A name applied by early writers (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 30, 1840) to a group of Moquelumnan Indians who formerly lived near the coast, in Marin co., Cal. (S. A. B.)

Nichewang. A village, probably of the Nipmuc, about the present Nichewang, near Petersham, Worcester co., Mass. The Indians remained until 1754, when they joined the French against the English.—Barber, Hist. Coll. Mass., 597, 1839; Kinnicutt, Ind. Names, 30, 1905.

Nichochi. A Chumashan village on Santa Cruz id., Cal., in 1542.

Nichochi.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith. Collec. Doc. Fla., 186, 1857. Nicochi.—Ibid.

Nicholas. See Orontony.

Niciat. The local name for a body of Upper Lillooet around Seton lake, interior of British Columbia. Pop. 50 in 1906.

Necait.—Can. Ind. Aff. Rep., pt. 1, 277, 1902. Niciat.—Ibid., pt. II, 272.

Nickajack. A former important Cherokee town on the S. bank of Tennessee r., in Marion co., Tenn. It was settled in 1782 by Cherokee who espoused the British cause in the Revolutionary war, and was known as one of the Chickamauga towns. It was destroyed in the fall of 1794. The meaning of the name is lost, and it is probably not of Cherokee origin, although it occurs also in the tribe as a man's name. In the corrupted form "Nigger Jack" it is applied to a creek of Cullasagee r. above Franklin, in Macon co., N. C. See Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887; Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 527, 1900.

Nicojack.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887. Nikutseg.—Mooney, op. cit. (abbr. form). Nikutse'gi.—Ibid. Nikwatsé'gi.—Ibid. Nukatsé'gi.—Ibid.

Nickomin. A former Chehalis town on North r., which flows into Shoalwater bay, Wash.

Necomanche.—Swan, N. W. Coast, 211, 1857. Nexume'nte.—Boas, inf'n, 1905, (correct native form).

Nicola Band. One of four subdivisions of the Upper Ntlakyapamuk in the interior of British Columbia.

Caws'xamux.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 170, 1900 ('people of the creek,' i. e., Nicola r.). Nicola band.—Ibid. Tcawa'xamux.—Ibid. Touā'qamuq.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 5, 1899.

Nicola Valley Indians. The official designation of a large number of local groups in British Columbia, principally Cowichan, Lillooet, and Ntlakyapamuk Indians, numbering 522 in 1878.—Can. Ind. Aff., 74, 1878.

Nicomen. A Cowichan tribe on Nicomen slough and at the mouth of Wilson cr., lower Fraser r., Brit. Col. Their villages are Skweahm and Lahau, but the name has become attached to the latter town of the tribe, which in 1906 had 16 inhabitants. The aggregate population of Nicomen and Skweahm was 44 in 1906.

Lek'ā'mel.—Boas in Rep. 64th Meeting Brit. A. A. S., 454, 1894. Nacomen.—Can. Ind. Aff., 78, 1878. Nek'ā'men.—Boas, op. cit. Nicoamen.—Can. Ind. Aff., 309, 1879. Nicoamin.—Ibid., 76, 1878. Nicomen.—Ibid., pt. I, 276, 1891.

Nicotowance. When the career of Opechancanough (q. v.) as chief of the Pamunkey tribe, as well as of the Powhatan confederacy, terminated on his death in 1644, he was succeeded as ruler of the Pamunkey Indians by Nicotowance. This chief, desirous of obtaining rest for his people, entered into a treaty of peace with the colonial authorities and was assigned, by an act of the Virginia assembly, Oct. 10, 1649, certain lands for himself and his people. His control, however, appears to have been of short duration, as he soon disappears from history. (C. T.)

Nigaluk. A Nunatogmiut Eskimo village at the mouth of Colville r., Alaska. Nig-a-lek.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, map, 1877. Nigaluk.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Nigco. The tribal name assigned to an Indian baptized in 1730 at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas. There were both Tonkawan and Coahuiltecan tribes there at the time, but the Nigco can not be identified with any of those known. It may be Sinicu, some of which tribe had been baptized in 1728, and who were probably Coahuiltecan (Valero Bautismos, partida 325, MS. in the custody of the bishop of San Antonio). (H. E. B.)

Nighetanka ('big belly'). A band of the Miniconjou Sioux.

Nige-tanka.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897. Nixe-tanka.—Ibid.

Nightsias. A Haida town of this name is given in John Work's list, 1836-41, with 15 houses and 280 inhabitants. It seems impossible to identify the name with that of any known town. On other grounds Kung, in Naden harbor, would appear to be the town intended.

Nigh tan.—Work (1836-41) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 489, 1855. Nigh-tasis.—Dawson, Queen Charlotte Ids., 173B, 1880.

Night Cloud. Mentioned by Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 142, 1851) as a band of Oglala Sioux. They probably took their name from the chief.

Nigiklik. A former Eskimo village in Alaska at the head of the Yukon delta. Nigiklik miout.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850. Nygykligmjut.—Holinberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855.

Nigottine ('moss people'). A part of the Kawchogottine division of the Kawchodinne living along the outlet of Great Bear lake, Mackenzie Ter., Canada.

Ni-gottinè.—Petitot in Bul. Soc. de Géog. Paris, chart, 1875. Nnéa-gottine.—Petitot, MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1865. Nni Gottinè.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891. Nni-ottiné.—Petitot, Dict. Dènè-Dindjé, xx, 1876.

Nijuchsagentisquoa (probably 'it is very tall reeds.'—Hewitt). A Cayuga chief, one of the signers, at Albany, N. Y., July 19, 1701, of the "deed from the Five Nations to the King [of England] of their beaver hunting ground."—N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 910, 1854.

Nikaomin (Nega'umîn, or Ngau'mîn, so named because the water comes from a lake called Nqatma'tko, 'wolf lake or water'; from sqatm, 'wolf'). A Ntlak-yapamuk town on the s. side of Thompson r., 10 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col. It is called Thompson by the whites. Pop. 49 in 1906.

Nega'umîn.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 171, 1900. Ni-ca-o-min.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1885, 196, 1886. Nicoomen.—Ibid., 309, 1879. Nicoomin.—Ibid., map, 1891. Nikaomin.—Ibid., pt. II, 166, 1901. N'kau'men.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Nqau'mîn.—Teit, op. cit. Thompson.—Ibid. (modern name).

Nikapashna ('bald head'). The third gens on the Chizhu side of the Ponca tribal circle. Its subgentes are Dtesindeitazhi, Dtedhezehatazhi, and Dtakh-tikianpandhatazhi.

Na-ke-poz'-na.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 155, 1877 (trans. 'elk'). Nika-da-ona.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 228, 1897.

Nikhddhitanwan. An ancient Osage village at the junction of the Sac and Osage rs. in Missouri.

Ni-qû' ta'-wa.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883. Niqdhi ta'-wa.—Ibid.

Nikhkak. A Knaiakhotana village of about a dozen houses on L. Clark, Alaska. The people, most of whom are of Russian admixture, obtain clothing and other articles of civilized comfort from the trading posts on Cook inlet. Their houses and fish caches are built of hewn logs, floored with planks, and they make windows of parchment. Pop. 42 in 1891; about 25 in 1904.

Keeghik.—Osgood in Nat. Geog. Mag., xv, 329, 1904 (from their name for the lake). Keejik.—Osgood (1902) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 364, 1906. Kijik.—Baker, ibid. Nikhak.—Osgood in Nat. Geog. Mag., op. cit. Nikhkak.—Coast Survey map (1898) cited by Baker, op. cit.

Nikiata. A Quapaw gens.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897.

Nikie name. A term employed by Dorsey (3d Rep. B. A. E., 227, 1884) to designate a name "referring to a mythical ancestor, to some part of his body, to some of his acts, or to some ancient rite which may have been established by him"; derived from nikië, the word for such a name in the Omaha dialect of the Siouan stock. According to Francis La Flesche (inf'n, 1907), nik(a-shi-ga)ie is derived from nikashiga 'people,' and ie 'word or utterance,' and a nikie name is one given by the people or by the word of the people—a name conferred by the consent of the people. As the chief was the mouthpiece of the people, a nikie name is sometimes defined as spoken by a chief, but the primary meaning is that the name is conferred by the word of the people. (A. F. C.)

Nikikouek (from the Chippewa or a cognate dialectic term nikig 'otter', with anim. pl. suffix -ouek = 'otter people'. Perrot says the form with initial m, Mikikouet, is from their own language; such is the case in the cognate Menominee mikig). A little known Algonquian tribe that formerly dwelt E. of the Missisauga, among the rock caverns on the N. shore of L. Huron. They are described as lacking in courage, and having much to do with the tribes northward. Twice a year, like the Missisauga, they deserted their village to hunt and fish along the lake for sturgeon and other fish, and there obtained bark for constructing canoes and lodges.

On the approach of winter they frequented the lake shores to kill beaver and elk, whence they returned in the spring to plant and tend their corn. In 1653, jointly with the Saulteurs and the Mississauga, they so completely defeated an Iroquois war-party of 120 men that but few escaped. (J. N. B. H.)

Gens de la Loutre.—Perrot (ca. 1724), Mémoire, 83, 1864. Mikikoues.—Ibid., 219. Mikikouët.—Ibid., 83. Nation de la Loutre.—Bacqueville de la Potherie, Hist. Amér. Sépt., II, 48, 1753. Nation of the Otter.—Heriot, Trav., 209, 1807. Nigik.—Kelton, Ft Mackinac, 20, 1884. Nikicouek.—Jes. Rel., III, index, 1858. Nikikouek.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 22, 1858. Nikikoues.—Perrot, Mémoire, index, 1864.

Nikishka. A Knaiakhotana village, of 57 inhabitants in 1880, near the head of Cook inlet, Alaska.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884.

Nikolaief (presumably named by the Russians after Tsar Nikolas). An Aleut village n. of Belkofski, on Alaska penin., Alaska; pop. 43 in 1880.

Nikolaievsky.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 23, 1884.

Nikolski. An Aleut settlement and trading post for otter skins on Umnak id., Alaska. Pop. 83 in 1834, 127 in 1880, 94 in 1890.

Nikolakeje.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855. Nikolsky.—Elliott, Our Arct. Prov., 184, 1886. Oomnak.—Ibid., 179. Rechesnaia.—Veniaminoff quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 35, 1884. Rechesnoi.—Lutke quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 462, 1906. Rieshesnos.—Ibid., 1902. Rjatscheschnoje.—Holmberg, op. cit. Rychesnoi.—Veniaminoff (1833) quoted by Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 225, 1875. Umnak.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 163, 1893.

Nikozliantin ('people of the river covered with the enemy's arrows'). A Takulli clan or division on the s. half of Stuart lake and on Pintee r., Brit. Col. They inhabit two villages, Nakraztli and Pintee. The name comes from a legend of a tribe of dwarfs who once attacked their village in such numbers that the surface of Stuart r. was covered with floating arrows (Morce in Trans. Can. Inst., 188, 1891). The Nikozliantin are devout Catholics, sober, law-abiding, and hospitable. Their main resources are hunting, trapping, and fishing. Pop. 234 in 1906.

Na-ka-le-tin.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 308, 1881. Nakarëto-ten.—Smet, Mss. de l'Oregon, 63, 1844. Na-ka-ztli-tenne.—Morce, letter, 1890. Nakozétoenne.—*Can. Ind. Niktak. A Kaviagmiut Eskimo village on C. Prince of Wales, Alaska.

Niktagmut.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. Am., I, 73, 1847 (the people).

Nilakshi ('dawn'). A former Klamath settlement at or below Nilaks mtn., e. shore of Upper Klamath lake, Oreg. The name is now used to designate Modoc point, but it properly refers to Nilaks mtn. ridge only.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxx, 1890.

Nilakshi máklaka.—Gatschet, op. cit., pt. II, 243 (name of people).

Nilalhuyu (Ni-lal-hu'-yu). A former Chumashan village on Santa Cruz id., Cal., the inhabitants of which are said to have been celebrated for the practice of sorcery.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Nilestunne (Ni-lëstúnne', 'people at the small dam in the river'). A former village of the Mishikhwutmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890.

Niletunne. A former village of the Tututni on the Oregon coast, being the first village s. of the Kusan village of Nasumi, s. of the mouth of Coquille r.

Jake's people.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 233, 1890 (referring to some man on Siletz res.). Ni-le' júnne'.—Ibid.

Nilsumack. A Salish band, probably Cowichan, under the Fraser superintendency, Brit. Col.—Can. Ind. Aff., 78, 1878.

Niltala. A Wikenon village on Rivers inlet, Brit. Col.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 130, 1887.

Nim (neum or nüm, 'people'). A name adopted by Merriam (Science, XIX, 916, 1904) to designate a Mono-Paviotso division on the n. fork of San Joaquin r. and the adjacent region in California. Regarding it, Kroeber (Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Archaeol. and Ethnol., IV, 119, 1907) says: "Nim is not a tribal name but the word for person, nüm, which occurs also in other Mono dialects as far s. and e. as Kings r. and Owens r., so that it cannot be regarded as distinctive of these people n. of the San Joaquin." In one or another form it is the common Shoshonean designation for 'men,' 'people.'

Pä-zo-öds.—Merriam, op. cit. (Holkomah name).

Nimatlala (Ni-mat-la'-la). A former Chumashan village on Santa Cruz id., e. of Prisoners harbor.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Nimham, Daniel. A Wappinger chief, noted not only for his active participation in the wars of 1746 and 1754, but especially for his efforts to recover for his tribe the lands lying along the e. side of Hudson r. that had been taken from it while aiding the English. The earliest recorded notice of him is Oct. 13, 1730, the date of an affidavit in which it is stated that the deponent was "a River Indian of the tribe of the Wappingers" (Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 51, 1872). Nimham was made chief sachem in 1740; his residence after 1746 was at Westenhuck. In 1755, with most of his fighting men, he entered the English service under Sir William Johnson, and about 1762, in company with some Mohegan chiefs of Connecticut, went to England on a mission regarding their land claims. They received a favorable hearing, and on their return to America their claims were brought into court, but were lost to sight during the Revolution. Nimham was killed at the battle of Kingsbridge, N. Y., Aug. 31, 1778, while fighting bravely in the cause of the Americans. Near the entrance to Pelham's Neck, Westchester co., N. Y., were, according to Ruttenber (op. cit., 81), two large mounds, pointed out as the sepulchers of Ann-Hoock and Nimham. The name of Daniel Nimham, as well as those of Aaron, John, and Isaac Nimham, appear in the rolls of New York men enlisted in the service of the Revolution. As Indians are included in the list, Daniel Nimham is doubtless the subject of this sketch. (C. T.)

Nimitapal. A former Chumashan village on Santa Cruz id. (the San Lucas of Cabrillo), Cal., in 1542. Possibly the same as Nimatlala.

Nimetapal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.

Nimitapal.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857.

Nimkish (^s*Ne'mgēs*). A Kwakiutl tribe on and about the river of the same name in N. E. Vancouver id. According to Rev. A. J. Hall they derived their name from that of a mythical halibut, called Numhyā-lī-gī-yū, which caused a tide-rip off the point of the bay. The gentes, according to Boas, are Gyigyilkam, Nenelkyenok, Sisintlae, Tlatlelamin, and Tsetsetloalakemae. Pop. 151 in 1901, 134 in 1906.

^s*Ne'mgēs*.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., v, pt. 1, 133, 1902. Ne'mk'ic.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 54, 1890. Ne'mqic.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 331, 1897. Némqisch.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 130, 1887. Nim-keesh.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1884, 190, 1885. Nimkis.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 19, 1862. Nim-kish.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. Nimkish.—Mayne, Brit. Col., 179, 1862. Num-kēs.—Hall quoted by Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 72, 1887.

Nimoyoyo. A Chumashan village on San Miguel id. (the Isla de Juan Rodriguez of Cabrillo), Cal., in 1542.

Nimulolo.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.

Nimollollo.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 186, 1857.

Nimsewi ('big river'). A division of Maidu living on upper Butte cr., near the edge of the timber in Butte co., Cal.

Nemshan.—Bancroft Nat. Races, I, 450, 1882. Nemshaw.—Hale, Ethnol. and Philol., 631, 1846. Nemshoos.—Bancroft, op. cit. Nemshous.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Nim Sewi.—Curtin, MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1885. Nim'shu.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 283, 1877 (from nem-sé-u, 'big river'). Nim-sirs.—Johnston (1850) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 45, 1853. Nim-skews.—Beale in Sen. Ex. Doc. 57, 32d Cong., 2d sess., 15, 1853. Nim-aus.—Johnston in Ind. Aff. Rep., 124, 1850.

Ninchopan ('bear'). A Tonkawa clan, now nearly extinct.

Nintchopan.—Gatschet, Tonkawe MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1881. Nintropan.—Ibid.

Ningweegon. See Negragon.

Ninibatan (Niniba-tan, 'keepers of the pipe'). A subgens of the Mandhinkagaghe gens of the Omaha.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 228, 1897.

Ninibatan A subgens of the Tapa gens of the Omaha.

Ninibatan. A subgens of the Inshtasanda gens of the Omaha, consolidated prior to 1880 with another subgens known as the Real Inshtasanda.

Ninigret. A sachem of the Niantic in the region about Westerly, R. I., and a cousin of Miantonomo. Besides the name Ninigret, Nenekunat, etc., he bore earlier that of Janemo or Ayanemo, by which he first became known to the English (Drake, Inds. of N. Am., 131, 1880). He visited Boston in 1637. After the death of Miantonomo he began war against the Mohegan, but the English interfered, and a treaty was signed at Boston in 1647. Contemporary chroniclers have left a detailed account of the appearance of Ninigret before the commissioners and his conduct on that occasion, which was much to his credit. Later (1652) Ninigret visited the Dutch at Manhattan, arousing the suspicions of the English, which were groundless. The next year he made war upon the Long Island Indians. He abstained from personal activity during King Philip's war, but had trouble in keeping terms with the English. He secured to himself and heirs the tribal land near Charlestown; and after the capture of Nanuntenuo (Canonchet), the last chief of the Narraganset, that tribe was consolidated with the Niantic under Ninigret. The latter and Miantonomo were lifelong rivals of Uncas. Notwithstanding his pacific tendencies, Ninigret was drawn into conflict with the Montauk of E. Long Island in 1659. Aptly called by Mather "an old crafty sachem," he seems to have preserved his pride, of which he possessed an inordinate amount, and his property as well, without being obliged to fight for either. Ninigret died full of years some time before the close of the century. He consistently opposed Christianity, and told Mayhew, the missionary, to "go and make the English good first." (A. F. C.)

Ninilchik. A Knaiakhotana village of 18 houses on the E. coast of Cook inlet, s. of the mouth of Kaslof r., Alaska; inhabited in 1890 by 45 natives and 36 Russian creole descendants of the convict colony of 1793.

Munina.—Wosnesenski's map (ca. 1840) cited by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 463, 1906. Ninilchik.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 27, 1884.

Ninivois. A Fox chief in command of the warriors of his tribe at the siege of Detroit by Pontiac, in 1763. Ninivois and Take, leader of the Hurons, appear to have been the most active aids of Pontiac at the commencement and during the early part of the siege (Mich. Pion. Coll., VIII, 266-339, 1886), and next to Pontiac were the leaders in the councils of the besiegers and the first to begin the investment of the fort. Fulton (Red Men of Iowa, 477, 1882) writes his name Ninivay and says he was a Potawatomi. (c. r.)

Ninnipaskulgee ('highroad people', from Creek nini-paski 'swept road', algi 'people'). A former band or tribe of Upper Creeks, probably near Tuckabatchi, Elmore co., Ala.

Ninny-pask-ulgees.—Woodward, Remin., 37, 1859.

Ninstints. A Haida town which formerly stood on Anthony id., at the s. end of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. The native name was Sga'nguai ('Red-cod island'), Ninstints being the white man's corruption of the town-chief's name, Nungstins (Nan stins, 'he who is two'). All the people from this end of Moresby id. gathered there in comparatively recent times. The remnant have since abandoned the place and settled at Skidegate. It is impossible to identify absolutely the name of this town with that of any given in John Work's list of 1836-41, but it is probably referred to as "Quee-ah," a town to which he assigned 20 houses and a population of 308. At the present day there are probably not a dozen Ninstints people left. The family to which the chief of this town belonged was the Sakikegawai. See Swanton, Cont. Haida, 105, 277, 1905. (J. R. S.)

Ninumu. A Chumashan village on one of the Santa Barbara ids., Cal., probably Santa Rosa, in 1542.

Ninimu.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.
Ninumu.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 186, 1857.

Ninvok. A Ch'nagmiut Eskimo village near the delta of Yukon r., Alaska.

Ninvaug.—Zagorskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850.

Ninyuelgual. A former Chumashan village near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Nio. A small tribe, probably Piman, long extinct, which formerly resided in s. Sinaloa, Mexico, their village, the seat of the mission of San Ignacio de Nio, occupying the site of the present town of the same name. Zapata, in 1678 (Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., iii, 404, 1854), said that a league and a half n. e. of San Pedro de Guazave was the pueblo of San Ignacio de Nio, in which the language spoken, called Nio, was particular unto itself, though the Mexican was also in common use. Alegre (Hist. Comp. Jesus, i, 294, 1841) states that Father Mendez, who had entered Sinaloa as a missionary, recommended "the pueblos and languages of the Ocoroiri [Ocoroni], Nio, and some others which he had held, to the charge of Father Tapia."

Niowe. Mentioned by Bartram (Travels, 371, 1792) as a Cherokee settlement on the headwaters of Tennessee r. about the year 1775. Possibly intended for Nâyû'hî, which signifies 'sand place.' Cf. Noewe. (J. M.)

Nipaguay. A Diegueño village near San Diego, s. Cal., about 6 m. from the old presidio to which, in 1774, the mission was removed. See San Diego.

Nipagudy.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Feb. 22, 1860.

Nipigiguit. A former Micmac village on the site of Bathurst, at the mouth of Nipisiguit r., New Brunswick. The French mission of Sainte Magdalen was there in 1645.

Nepegigouit.—Jes. Rel. 1645, 35, 1858. Nipigiguit.—Vetromile, Abnakis, 59, 1866. Nipisiguit.—Membre quoted by Shea, Miss. Val., 86, 1852.

Nipinchen. Given by Bolton (Hist. Westchester Co., 1881) as a former Indian fort on the n. side of Spuyten Duyvil (or Papirinemen) cr., at its junction with Hudson r. from the e., in Westchester co., N. Y. Ruttenber (Ind. Geog. Names, 22, 1906) says the name belongs on the w. side of the Hudson, at Konstable's Hook, and doubts that there was any real settlement there. Cf. Nipinichsen.

Nipinichsen. A former Manhattan village on the e. bank of Hudson r., just above Spuyten Duyvil, N. Y.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 77, 1872.

Nipissing ('at the little water or lake', referring to L. Nipissing; Nipisirinien, 'little-water people'). A tribe of the Algonkin. When they first became known to the French, in 1613, they were residing in the vicinity of L. Nipissing, Ontario, which has been their home during most of the time to the present. Having been attacked, about 1650, by the Iroquois, and many of them slain, they fled for safety to L. Nipigon (Mackenzie, Voy., xli, note, 1802), where Allouez visited them in 1667, but they were again on L. Nipissing in 1671. A part of the tribe afterward went to Three Rivers, and some resided with the Catholic Iroquois at Oka, where they still have a village. Some of these assisted the French in 1756. It is their dialect which is represented in Cuoq's Lexique de la Langue Algonquine. They were a comparatively unwarlike people, firm friends of the French, readily accepting the Christian teachings of the missionaries. Although having a fixed home, they were semi-nomadic, going s. in autumn to the vicinity of the Hurons to fish and prepare food for the winter, which they passed among them. They cultivated the soil to a slight extent only, traded with the Cree in the n., and were much given to jugglery and shamanistic practices, on which account the Hurons and the whites called them Sorcerers. Their chiefs were elective, and their totems, according to Chauvignerie (N. Y.

Doc. Col. Hist., x, 1053, 1855), were the heron, beaver, birchbark, squirrel, and blood. No reliable statistics in regard to their numbers have been recorded. The Indians now on a reservation on L. Nipissing are officially classed as Chippewa; they numbered 162 in 1884, and 223 in 1906. A Nipissing division was called Miskouaha.

Nipky. Probably a Lower Creek town, as "Appalya, beloved man of Nipky," is mentioned among the Lower Creek chiefs in a document dated Frederica, Ga., in 1747.—McCall, Hist. Ga., I, 367, 1811.

Nipmuc (from Nipamaug, 'fresh-water fishing place'). The inland tribes of central Massachusetts living chiefly in the s. part of Worcester co., extending into Connecticut and Rhode Island. Their chief seats were on the headwaters of Blackstone and Quinebaug rs., and about the ponds of Brookfield. Hassanamisit seems to have been their principal village in 1674, but their villages had no apparent political connection, and the different parts of their territory were subject to their more powerful neighbors, the Massachuset, Wampanoag, Narraganset, and Mohegan, and even tributary to the Mohawk. The Nashua, dwelling farther n., are sometimes classed with the Nipmuc, but were rather a distinct body. The New England missionaries had 7 villages of Christian Indians among them in 1674; but on the outbreak of King Philip's war in the next year almost all of them joined the hostile tribes, and at its close fled to Canada or westward to the Mahican and other tribes on the Hudson.

The following villages and bands probably belonged to the Nipmuc: Accomack, Chabanakongkomun, Chachau-bunkkakowok, Hadley Indians, Hassanamisit, Magunkaquog, Manchaug, Manexit, Massomuck, Medfield, Menemesseg, Metewemesick, Missogkonnog, Musketaquid, Nashobah, Nichewaug, Okomma-kamesit, Pakachoog, Quabaug, Quahmsit, Quantisset, Quinebaug, Segunesit, Squawkeag, Tatumasket, Totapoag, Wacuntug, Wenimesset, and Woruntuck. Nipoma. A former Chumashan village near Santa Inez mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal. (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860). Perhaps the same as Nipomo.

Nipomo. A former village under San Luis Obispo mission, 8 m. inland from San Luis Obispo, Cal. Perhaps the same village (Nipoma) given by Taylor as near Santa Inez mission.

Ni-pó-mó.—Schumacher in Smithsonian. Rep. 1874, 342, 1875.

Niquesesquelua. A Chumashan village on one of the Santa Barbara ids., Cal., probably Santa Rosa, in 1542.

Niquesesquelua.—Wheeler Surv. Rep., vii, 311, 1879. Niquesesquelua.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 186, 1857.

Niquipos. A Chumashan village on either Santa Rosa or Santa Cruz id., Cal., in 1542.

Niquipos.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857. Niquipos.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.

Nirdlirn. A summer settlement of the Kingnaitmiut subtribe of the Okomiut Eskimo on the s. coast near the head of Cumberland ad., Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Gisá'lalam.—Boas, Chinook Texts, 260, 1894 (own name). Nasal.—Swan, N. W. Coast, 211, 1857. Nisal.—Boas, op. cit.

Niscak ('bustard'). A tribe or division mentioned with other Algonquian tribes of the region between L. Superior and Hudson bay in the Prise de Possession (1671) in Perrot, Mém., 293, 1864. They were perhaps a gens of the Ottawa.

Nishinam (from nisenani, 'our relations'). The southern branch of the Maidu, occupying the valley of Bear r., Cal. While this portion of the Maidu is in some ways distinct from the northern branches, all of this family are so similar in every respect that even without the fact of the complete linguistic unity which they represent it would seem illogical to separate them. The Nishinam divisions and villages, which were once populous and numerous along Bear r., are as follows: Divisions—Koloma, Pusune, Vesnak, and Wapumne. Villages—Bushamul, Chuemdu, Hamitinwoliyu, Intanto, Kaluplo, Kapaka, Lelikian, Lidlipa, Mulamchapa, Opelto, Pakanchi, Pulakatu, Shokumimlepi, Shutamul, Solakiyu, Talak, Toanimbuttuk, and Yokolimdu. See Maidu, Pujunan Family. (R. B. D.)

Nisibourounik. One of the four divisions of the Cree.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 22, 1858.

Niska. The dialectic name for one of the three Chimmesyan divisions, the other two being the Kitsan and the Tsimshian. In tradition, art, and manner of living these three divisions are closely allied, with such geographic differences as would naturally occur. In language less than one-third of the vocabulary is common to all, a like proportion varies in accent, while the remainder is different and more local in character. Dialectic differences are much less marked between the two interior river divisions than between either of them and the Tsimshian of the coast.

The territory of the Niska includes Observatory inlet, Nass bay, and the drainage basin of Nass r. and its tributaries, but those northern sources that interlock with the Iskoot and the Stikine rs. are claimed also by the Tahltan, and over this contention have occurred many wars that have always kept these people apart. The Niska villages have always been on the main river and show evidence of considerable size. The houses, in a single row, follow the contour of the shore; they are built of hewn timbers in the form of a parallelogram, with a central open fireplace of gravel, and a smoke-hole in the roof. Carved heraldic columns stand in front, in which the crest of the deceased is shown at the base and that of the successor at the top, and in one old village grave-houses of logs surmounted by animal and bird forms in wood and stone, representing the totemic emblems of the dead, rest on the river bank in the midst of the columns.

With the establishment of missions the older villages have generally been deserted and the people are being concentrated at three points, under the supervision of missionaries of the Church of England, and small modern dwellings are taking the place of the old communal house. Modern ideas prevail, and the condition of the people is a credit to both their teachers and themselves. The villages, past and present, together with the more important village sites, are: Kincolith, Kitaix, Lakkulzap or Greenville, Gwinwork, Lakungida or Ankeegar, Kisthemuwelgit or Willshilhtumwillgit, Qunahhair, Kitwinshilk, Sheaksh, Aiyansh, Kitlakdamix, and Kitwinkole. Other town names have been given, as follows, but these, wholly or in part, may duplicate some of the above: Kitahon, Kitangata, Kitlakaous, and Andeguale.

The Niska were divided geographically into the Kitkahten ('people of the lower valley'), including those below the canyon, and the Kitanweliks ('people of the upper river'), comprising those above this point.

Tradition tells that long ago when the principal village was across the river to the southward, some little boys were amusing themselves by catching salmon, cutting slits in their backs in which they inserted flat stones, and then letting them go, playing they were whales. This so incensed the guardian spirit that, rising from the mountain to the southward enveloped in a wide spreading black cloud that changed day into night, with eyes of flame and voice of thunder, he rolled down the mountain side as a river of fire and swept the village away. The people fled across the river and took refuge on the hills until quiet was restored, when they divided, some settling at Kitlakdamix and there retaining the old name of Kitauwiliks, while the others, founding Kitwinshilk on the rocks overlooking the rapids, were ever afterward known by the name of their village as 'The people among the lizards.'

The social organization is founded upon matriarchy, and is dependent upon the existence of four exogamous parties, distinguished by their crests, who intermarry and who supplement one another on all occasions of ceremony. These parties are subdivided into families who are represented by minor crests but who still retain the party emblem. These four parties are: (1) Laghkepo, represented by the Wolf and having as its subdivisions the Brown-bear, Crow, Crane, and Red-wing flicker; (2) Laghkeak, represented by the Eagle and having as its subdivisions the Beaver, Owl, Dog-fish, and Squirrel; (3) Kanhadda, represented by the Raven and having as its subdivisions the Frog, Sea-lion, Sculpin, and Star-fish; (4) Kishpootwada, represented by the Killer-whale and having as its subdivisions the Osprey and the Bear-under-Water. (Boas gives the following subdivisions: Gyitkadok, Lakseel, Laktiaktl, Gyitgyigvenik, Gyitwulnakyel, Gyiskabenak, Lakloukst, Gyitsaek, Laktsemelik, and Gyisgahast. He assigns the first two to the Raven phratry, the next three to the Wolf phratry, the four following to the Eagle phratry, and the last to the Bear phratry.)

The Niska look to the river for their food supply, which consists principally of salmon and eulachon. Indeed it is owing to the enormous number of the latter fish that run in to spawn in the early spring that the name Nass, meaning 'the stomach, or food depot', has been given to the river.

In 1902 the population of the Niska towns was 842; in 1906, 814. (G. T. E.)

Nith-songs. The nith-songs (Norwegian nith, 'contention') of the Greenland Eskimo are a species of word duel in which the audience present has the deciding voice, a sort of decision by "song and dance" of private quarrels and disputes—primitive arbitration, as it were. As described by Crantz (1767) and Egede (1746) this institution is as follows: When a Greenlander considers himself injured in any way by another person, he composes about him a satirical song, which he rehearses with the help of his intimates. He then challenges the offending one to a duel of song. One after another the two disputants sing at each other their wisdom, wit, and satire, supported by their partisans, until at last one is at his wit's end, when the audience, who are the jury, make known their decision. The matter is now settled for good, and the contestants must be friends again and not recall the matter which was in dispute. Egede styled this song contest "the common mode of avenging one's self in Greenland." To make his opponent the laughing stock of the community is a sweet morsel of revenge for an Eskimo. The general opinion of travelers and others is that the "song duel" was a very useful and even praiseworthy social institution, and Nansen expresses his regret that on the w. coast of Greenland it has been abolished by the missionaries. On the e. coast it lingers, as Nansen reports, in the form of the so-called "drum dance," the only real judicial institution of these Eskimo. The fear of public shame is very powerful as a factor in social betterment. This remarkable restriction of vengeance and modification of the duel has been largely overlooked by sociologists. Boas reports the nith-song as still in vogue among the Eskimo of Baffin land, where "downright hostile feelings and personal grudges are settled by the opponents meeting on a fixed occasion and singing songs at each other"; and Swanton reports an analogous custom among the Tlingit, entered into by opposing phratries. Brinton (Essays of Amer., 287, 1890) gives a specimen of this poetic duel, furnished by Rink. Consult also Egede, Descr. of Greenland, 153, 1745; Crantz, Hist. of Greenland, 178, 1767; Nansen, First Crossing, 337, 1890; Steinmetz, Entwickl. der Strafe, II, 67-76, 1892. (A. F. C.)

Noatagamut's.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 60, 1881. Noatak.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 464, 1906.

Nobscusset. A village, perhaps of the Nauset, that was subject to the Wampanoag; situated near the present Dennis, Barnstable co., Mass. In 1685 it was a village of the Praying Indians.

Nobequasseta.—Hoyt, Antiq. Res., 89, 1821. Nobscussett.—Hinckley (1685) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., v, 133, 1861. Nobequassit.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 2, 118, 1848. Nobequassitt.—Gookin (1674) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., I, 148, 1806. Nobequassit.—Bourne (1674), ibid., 197.

Nocake. Parched corn-meal, a dish which the English colonists adopted, with its name, from the Algonquian tribes of New England. Roger Williams (Key to Am. Lang., 11, 1643) defines the Narraganset nokchick as "parched meal, which is a readie very wholesome food, which they eat with a little water." The Massachusetts form as given by Eliot is nookhic, the same as nokhik. Wood, in 1634, uses the form nocake; Palfrey (New Eng., I,

28, 1858) has nookhik. The word signifies 'it is soft'. (A. F. C.)

Nochak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on Chulitna r., Alaska; pop. 28 in 1890.

Noh-chamiut.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 164, 1893 (the people).

Nochpeem. A tribe or band of the Wappinger confederacy formerly occupying the e. bank of the Hudson about the site of Matteawan, Dutchess co., N. Y. De Laet locates here the Pachami, but Ruttenber says these may have been the Tankitekes, and, indeed, a chief of the latter bore the name Pacham or Pachem. They had a village called Nochpeem, and others called Keskistkonk and Pasquasheck, but their principal one seems to have been called Canopus, from their chief. (J. M.)

Highlanders.—Doc. of 1660 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 182, 1881. Highland Indians.—Doc. of 1655, ibid., 52. Hogelanders.—Breedon Raedt (ca. 1630) quoted by Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 80, 1872 (Dutch form). Noch-Peem.—Van der Donck (1656) quoted by Ruttenber, ibid., 72. Nochpeem.—Treaty of 1644 in N. Nohulchinta. The highest Koyukukhotana village on Koyukuk r., on the s. fork, 3 m. above the junction. It contained 6 families in 1885.

Nohoolchintna.—Allen, Rep., 99, 1887.

Nohuntsitk (Nō'runt's'itr). A Kwakiutl tribe living at the lower end of Wikenolake, coast of British Columbia.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 328, 1897.

Noieltai (Noi'eltai, 'burnt body'). A Ntlakyapamuk village on the w. side of Fraser r., about 23 m. above Yale, Brit. Col.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 169, 1900.

Nok. A former Koyukukhotana village on the w. bank of Koyukuk r., Alaska, near its mouth; pop. 50 in 1844.

Nokhakate.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXI, map, 1850. Nok-khakat.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Noka.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 44, 1885. No-kaig.—Ibid., 87 (plural). Nōk'e.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906.

Noka. A chief of the western Chippewa in the latter half of the 18th century, who attained some celebrity as a leader and hunter. The chief incident of his life relates to the war between the Mdewakanton and the Chippewa for possession of the banks of the upper Mississippi. In 1769, the year following the battle of Crow Wing, Minn.—where the Chippewa, though maintaining their ground, were hampered by inferior numbers—they determined to renew the attack on the Mdewakanton with a larger force. This war party, under the leadership of Noka, referred to as "Old Noka" evidently on account of his advanced age, attacked Shakopee's village on Minnesota r., Minn., the result being a drawn battle, the Chippewa retiring to their own territory without inflicting material damage on their enemy. Regarding Noka's skill as a hunter, it is said that he killed in one day's hunt, starting from the mouth of Crow Wing r., Minn., 16 elk, 4 buffalo, 5 deer, 3 bears, a lynx, and a porcupine. Hole-in-the-day was one of Noka's descendants (Warren in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 266, 1885).

Nokehick. See Nocake.

Nokem (No'qem, from s'nō'k, 'valley'). A village of the Spences Bridge band of Ntlakyapamuk at a place called by the whites Drynoch, on the s. side of Thompson r., 16 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 172, 1900.

Noketrotra. Mentioned as a tribe, seemingly Moquelumnan, formerly on Fresno r., Cal.—Wessels in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 30, 1857.

Nokosalgi ('bear people', from nokōsi 'bear', algi 'people'). A Creek clan.

Nokōsalgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 155, 1884. No-kuse'.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1877.

Azashagyagmut.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. Am., I, 73, 1847. Nokrotmiut.—Coast Surv., 1868, quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1901.

Nonantum ('I rejoice,' or 'I am well-minded.'—Trumbull). A Massachusetts village on Nonantum hill, near Newton, Middlesex co., Mass. John Eliot began his missionary labors here in 1646, and it was soon after established by law as a village for the converts. In 1650–51 they removed to Natick.

Hoanantum.—Hutchinson in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 518, 1836. Nanitomen.—Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., X, 14, 1809. Nonandom.—Harris, ibid., 1st s., IX, 192, 1804. Nonantum.—Gookin (1674), ibid., I, 148, 1806. Eliot (1646) quoted by Pilling, Algonq. Bibliog., 177, 1891. Nonatum.—Gookin (1677) in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 518, 1836. Noonanetum.—Shepard (1648) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., IV, 38, 1834. Noonatomen.—Eliot (1647), ibid., 20.

Nonapho. A tribal name given in the book of burials at Mission San Antonio de Valero, Texas, in 1726. Only one entry was made under this name, which was for the burial of a child of a Mesquite father and a Nonapho mother. The Mesquites (there appear to have been different tribes by this name) were apparently Tonkawan. At this time there were also Coahuiltecan tribes at the mission, but the Nonapho can not be identified with any of the known tribes (Entierros, San Antonio de Valero, MS. in the custody of the Bishop of San Antonio). (H. E. B.)

Nonawharitse. A Tuscarora village in North Carolina in 1701, mentioned by Lawson (1709), N. C., 383, 1860.

Non-che-ning-ga. See Nacheninga.

Nondas ('steep hill.'—Hewitt). A former Seneca village, visited in 1791 (Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., i, 151, 1832) by Col. Thomas Procter, who says it lay 8 m. from Squakie hill, which would place it near the present Nunda, Livingston co., N. Y. Mary Jemison, "the white woman," lived there then. (W. M. B.)

Non-gee-ninga. See Nacheninga.

Nongee's Village. A former settlement, probably of the Chippewa, named after a resident chief, situated about the junction of Thornapple cr. with Grand r., Kent co., Mich., a few miles E. of Grand Rapids. The land on which it was situated was ceded to the United States by the treaty of Chicago, Aug. 29, 1821.

Norridgewock (from Naurantswak, 'people of the still water between rapids'). A tribe of the Abnaki confederacy, the typical tribe of the group. Their closest relationship was with the Penobscot, Arosaguntacook, and Wewenoc. Their territory embraced the Kennebec valley nearly to the river's mouth, Norridgewock, their principal village, being on the left bank just below the rapids, near the present Norridgewock, Me. The French established a mission at their village in 1688. In 1695 the Jesuit Father Rasles took up his residence there and succeeded in attaching the tribes so warmly to the French cause that they soon came to be regarded as dangerous enemies of the English colonists. In 1724 an expedition was sent against the Norridgewock, which resulted in the destruction of their village, the dispersion of the tribe, and the death of Rasles. They fled in different parties to the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy, and to St. Francis in Canada. A number afterward returned and settled in their old home, but owing to the continued unfriendly disposition of the whites, who again attacked their village in 1749, returned at the breaking out of the French and Indian war in 1754 to St. Francis. A few families that remained behind for some years finally found their way also to Canada. See Abnaki, Missions.

Norsit. An East Greenland Eskimo village on an island at the mouth of Angmagssalik fjord, lat. 65° 33'; pop. 25 in 1884.—Meddelelser om Grønland, IX, 379, 1889.

Northern Assiniboin. A division of the Assiniboin as recognized about the middle of the 19th century and earlier. Perhaps the same as the Tschantoga (q. v.), or Gens des Bois of Maximilian, and the Wood Stoneys or Stonies of northern Alberta of the present day, although Denig (1854) says they were so called because they came from the N. in 1839. In Denig's time they numbered 60 lodges under Le Robe de Vent.

Northern Comanche. The name by which the Kwahari, Ditsakana, and Detsanayuka were sometimes designated collectively to distinguish them from the Penateka, who were known as Eastern or Southern Comanche.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1045, 1896.

North Fork. A village in the Canadian district of the Creek Nation, Ind. T., in 1858 (Smith in Ind. Aff. Rep., 149, 1858). The name doubtless refers to the N. fork of Canadian r.

North Herndon. A Netchilirmiut Eskimo village at Felix harbor, Boothia, Can.—Ross, Second Voy., 249, 1835.

Norumbega. A name used by explorers and cartographers of the 16th and the first half of the 17th century to designate the Penobscot r. in Maine, a fabulous great city upon its banks, and a province or "kingdom," including the adjacent

New England coast, and sometimes extended in its application to include the whole coast region from Nova Scotia to Virginia. It occurs as Aranbega on the map of Hieronimus Verrazano of 1529, as Auorobagra on a Jomard map of 1543, and as Nurumbega on the Gastaldi map of 1550. With better knowledge of the region the province disappeared and the great city dwindled to a few wigwams at a place called by the Penobscot Indians Agguncia, supposed (Godfrey in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., VII, 1876) to have been about the present site of Brewer, opposite Bangor, on Penobscot r., Me.

The derivation of the name has been much disputed, but it is generally admitted to be of Indian origin, although attempts have been made to give it a Norse meaning. According to Vetromile, the best recent authority on the Abnaki language, the correct Abnaki form is Nolumbeka, meaning 'a succession of falls and still water', used by the Indians to designate certain parts of Penobscot r., and not the river itself. Father Sebastian Rasles, author of the great Abnaki dictionary, gives the form as Aränmbeg8k, 'au fond de l'eau', from aränm, 'au fond'; but which Hewitt thinks means 'at the clay inlet'. According to Gatschet (Nat. Geog. Mag., VIII, 23, 1897), Penobscot nalambigi and Passamaquoddy nalabégik both refer to the still, quiet (nala-) stretch of a river between two riffles, rapids, or cascades; -bégik, for nipégik, means 'at the water.' A manuscript authority quoted by Winsor (Hist. Am., III, 184, 1884) gives the Penobscot form as Nah-rah-bé-gek. De Costa, in the same volume, inclines to a European origin for the name, which Beauvois (1880) derives from Norroenbygda, 'Norway country', and Horsford (Discov. Anc. City Norumbega, 1890) from Norbega, an ancient name for Norway, claiming also to identify the river as Charles r., Mass., and the town site as at the present Watertown. (J. M.)

Norwalk. A band holding lands on Norwalk and Saugatuck rs., s. w. Conn., which they sold in 1640 and 1641, Mahackemo being then the principal chief (De Forest, Inds. Conn., 177, 1851). No tribal name is given this people, but they were probably closely connected with the Pangusset, about Stratford, or with the more important Quinnipiac about New Haven. (J. M.)

Norwootuc. An Algonquian tribe or band whose possessions extended from the "great falls" at South Hadley to Mt Sugar Loaf, in the Connecticut valley, Mass. They were attacked by the Mohegan about 1636, and were at war with the Montauk and Narraganset. They were probably a part of the Indians who took part in King Philip's war of 1675 and afterward fled the country, as "Norwootuck plantations" are mentioned in 1678 as if a new English settlement. The Norwootuc were probably the "Nowonthewog or the Eastward Indians," who in 1700 combined with the Mohawk against the English colonists. (J. M.)

Notched plates. Stone plates of discoidal or rectangular form obtained mainly from ancient mounds in the Ohio valley and the Southern states. Heretofore these plates have been classed with problematical objects (q. v.), and the significance of some specimens remains yet in doubt; but Moore has shown that those obtained in Alabama were undoubtedly used in grinding pigments. It is also observed that a close analogy exists between these tablets and the pigment plates employed by the Pueblos and other Southwestern tribes, and also frequently encountered among the ancient ruins of the S. W. (Fewkes, Russell). The rectangular specimens rarely exceed 10 in. in width by about 15 in. in length, and the discoidal variety ranges from 6 to 15 in. in diameter. The thickness does not exceed 1½ in. The central portion of one face is often slightly concave, a few are quite flat on both faces, while a smaller number are doubly convex in a slight degree. The margins are square or roundish in section. With rare exceptions the periphery of the discoidal plates is notched or scalloped. In many cases one or more engraved lines or grooves encircle the face of the plate near the margin, and not infrequently the marginal notches extend as shallow grooves inward over the surface of the plate, terminating against the outer encircling band, or connect as loops forming what may be regarded as reversed scallops. The most striking feature of these plates, occurring perhaps in one case in ten, is certain engraved designs occupying the reverse side of the plate, the grinding surface being regarded as the obverse. These subjects are undoubtedly of mythologic origin and include highly conventional representations of the human hand, the open eye, the rattlesnake, death's-head symbols, etc. The rectangular plates have notches or scallops at the ends only, and the surface, excepting in the Ohio specimens (which are tentatively included in this group), has no embellishment other than simple engraved lines extending across the plate near the ends or continuing around the four sides just inside the border.

The most noteworthy of the rectangular plates are the Cincinnati tablet, from a mound in Cincinnati, Ohio, described by Clark, and by Putnam and Willoughby; the Hurst tablet, found in Pike co., Ohio; the Berlin tablet, found in Jackson co., Ohio, and a number of other decorated specimens from Southern mounds, described by Rau, Moore, and others. Interesting examples of the discoidal plates are the Naples, Ill., specimen, described by Henderson, and the Arkansas Post specimen, described by Stoddard. These two disks are without marginal notches. Numerous discoidal tablets obtained from mounds in Mississippi and Alabama are described by Moore and Holmes. The feathered serpent tablet from Issaquena co., Miss., the knotted serpent tablet from Moundville, Ala., and other pictured specimens from the latter locality, described by the same authors, are deserving of special mention.

STODDARD PLATE, ARKANSAS. DIAM. 1 1/4 IN.

It is observed that these plates are made of sandstone and kindred gritty materials, and this fact confirms Moore's conclusion that they were used in grinding pigments. That they were held in exceptional esteem by their owners is shown by their burial with the dead. These facts indicate clearly that the plates were not intended to serve an ordinary purpose, but rather that they filled some important sacred or ceremonial office, as in preparing colors for shamanistic use or for religious ceremonies. The engraved designs on these plates naturally give rise to speculation, and it is not surprising that the very general presence of notched and scalloped margins should suggest the theory that the plates were sun symbols. But a critical examination of the various markings and figures leads to the conviction that all are representative, in a more or less conventional fashion, of animal originals and that all were probably employed because of their peculiar esoteric significance and relationship with the functions of the tablets. It is observed that the notches cut in the edges of the plates are in many instances carried inward over the plate in such a way as to suggest feathers, as these are often formally treated in native art, and this leads to the surmise that the animal original might have been a duck—a symbol of wide distribution among the Indian tribes in the S.; but recalling the occurrence of the feathered-serpent design engraved on the obverse of the Mississippi tablet, the idea is suggested that the original concept in the mind of the makers of these plates was, at least in some cases, the feathered serpent, a northern form of Quetzalcoatl, a chief deity of the middle American peoples.

A noteworthy feature of the engravings of the serpents and other figures on these mound tablets is the apparent maturity of the art, the intricate forms being skillfully disposed and drawn with a certain hand. The designs are not mere random products, but, like the copper ornaments, the earthenware decorations, and the shell engravings of the Gulf states, were evidently made by skilled artists practising a well-matured art which distinently suggests the work of the semicivilized nations of Mexico and Central America. These plates may be regarded as furnishing additional proof that the influence of the culture of middle America has been felt all along the northern shores of the Gulf of Mexico and has passed with diminished force still farther to the N.

They called themselves Cheroenhaka, and were known to the neighboring Algonquian tribes as Mangoe (Mengwe) and Nottoway, i. e., Nadowa (q. v.), 'adders,' a common Algonquian name for tribes of alien stock. Although never prominent in history they kept up their organization long after the other tribes of the region were practically extinct. As late as 1825 they still numbered 47, with a "queen," on a reservation in Southampton co. Linguistically they were closely cognate to the Tuscarora. (J. M.)

Novaculite. A very fine-grained and compact chalcedonic (quartz) rock, ordinarily white or whitish in color, and often distinguished by the archeologist by its somewhat translucent waxy appearance. It occurs in vast bodies in connection with Ordovician (Lower Silurian) strata in Arkansas, especially in the vicinity of Hot Springs, where it was extensively quarried by the aborigines. The ancient excavations here cover many hundreds of acres of the mountain ridges and are surrounded by large bodies of refuse—the result of roughing-out implements by flaking processes. As with the great quarries of Flint Ridge, Ohio, and other localities, the principal product was the leaf-shaped blade, from which arrow- and spear-heads and knives were to be specialized, but the material was used also for axes, celts, ceremonial objects, and ornaments, in the manufacture of which the flaking work was supplemented by pecking and grinding. Ntlakyapamuk. One of the four great Salish tribes inhabiting the interior of British Columbia and popularly called Thompson Indians, from the river on which a large part of them live. Internally they are divided into the Lower Thompsons, living from a short distance below Spuzzum on Fraser r., nearly to the village of Cisco, and the Upper Thompsons, whose towns extend from the latter point nearly to Lillooet on the Fraser, to within a short distance of Ashcroft on the Thompson, and over all of Nicola valley. The Upper Thompsons are subdivided by Teit into

4 major bands, the Lytton band, the Nicola band, the Spences Bridge band, and the Upper Fraser band. In addition the following subdivisions are mentioned: Ancho Creek, Boothroyds, Canoe Lake Indians, Cooks Ferry, Rhaap, Skowtons, and Snakaim. Total population 1,826 in 1902, 1,776 in 1906. The following list of villages was obtained principally from Teit:

Villages of the Lower Thompsons. Chetaco, Kablaudek, Kapachichin, Kapasac, Kinnis, Kleaukt, Kolanm, Nkakim, Nkattim, Nkolam, Noietst, Spuktum, Vstaiek, Sintakt, Skohwak, Skuzis, Skwa'yik, Spaim, Spuzzum, Stahelani, Suk, Tawwayam, Tikwalus, Tiktlak-ah, Tzanamuk.

Villages of the Lytton band. Anektettim, Hsao, Kittawat, Natkelpetenk, Nehok-ekokenk, Nehowmean, Nikaomin, Nko-ko, Nkya, Noot, Npunchin, Ntlaktlak-ah, Staiya, Stryne, Tikamehen, Tuh-ah.

Villages of the Upper Fraser band. Ahul-ah, Nesokep, Nkaktko, Ntlippaem, Nkek-ah, Taks.

Villages of the Spences Bridge band. At-ah, Ahken, Klukluk, Nkamchin, Nkoentmay possibly be synonymous: Chenek, Kekomap, Nhaiiken, Nkahlmih, Nkaih, Nzatzahatko, Paska, Schaeken, Shknet, Shknokem, Shmup, Skappa, Snakaim, Spapium, Timet, Tsuzel.

Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe. A Franciscan mission established by order of the Viceroy of Mexico on Guadalupe r., Tex., about 1755, with the purpose of gathering the dispersed neophytes who had been at the San Xavier missions on San Gabriel r. Some of the Mayeye from San Xavier de Horcasitas mission were congregated there for a time and two missionaries settled among them; but it does not appear that any mission buildings were erected, nor is it certain that the mission was ever formally founded. Soon afterward the missionaries were ordered to San Saba and the place was abandoned (Informe de Misiones, 1762, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVIII, 180; Bonilla, Breve Compendio, in Tex. Hist. Ass'n Quar., VIII, 50-51, 1905; Arricivita, Crónica, II, 337, 1792). (H. E. B.)

N. S. de Guadalupe.—Informe de Misiones, 1762, MS., op. cit.

Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe. A mission established by Padres Ugarte and Helen in 1720-21 on the w. coast of Lower California, lat. 27°. It had 5 visitas in the vicinity in 1726, and 4 in 1745, the others no doubt having become a part of one of the missions founded in the meantime. In 1767 the mission counted 530 baptized natives, speaking a dialect of Cochimi, according to Hervás (Saggio, 79-80, 1787).

Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe de los Nacogdoches. A mission founded July 9, 1716, by the Franciscans of Zacatecas, at the Nacogdoche village and for the Nacogdoche and Nacao tribes. The site was evidently that of the present city of Nacogdoches, Tex. It was the head Zacatecan mission in E. Texas, being at first in charge of the president, Fray Antonio Margil de Jesus. After him, the most noted missionary there was Joseph Calahorra y Saenz (ca. 1750-1770). In 1719 the mission was abandoned, like the others of E. Texas, and when in 1721 Aguayo and Margil de Jesus went to reestablish it, not a sign of church or dwelling remained. On Aug. 18 the new church was dedicated; Fray José Rodríguez was put in charge, and 390 Indians were given presents, having promised to settle in a pueblo, a promise which they evidently never fulfilled. When in 1730-31 the Querétaran missions near by were transferred to San Antonio, this with the other Zacatecan missions was retained, but it was never successful. More than once it was in danger of destruction by the Indians, who were made hostile to the Spaniards by the influence of the French. By 1752 the Nacogdoche Indian village had been removed some 3 leagues northward. In 1767 Rubí reported the mission to be without a single neophyte, either baptized or under instruction. The next year Solís reported that there were an adobe church and several wooden buildings at the mission, but found in the books the record of only 12 baptisms, 8 burials, and 5 marriages. With the cession of Louisiana to Spain in 1762 one of the chief reasons for the mission's existence was removed, and accordingly, on recommendation by Rubí in 1767, its abandonment, together with that of the neighboring establishments, was ordered in 1772 and effected in 1773. Part of the settlers who had been removed in the latter year from E. Texas settled in 1774 on the Trinity, at a place called Pilar de Bucareli; but, because of a flood and attacks by the Comanche, they migrated in 1779 to the site of the Nacogdoche mission, apparently occupying some of its buildings, and became the founders of modern Nacogdoches.

Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria. One of three Franciscan missions established about 1747-48 on San Xavier (now San Gabriel) r., Tex. For the circumstances of its founding, see San Francisco de Horcasitas and consult also San Ildefonso. This was the last of these three missions to be put in operation, but it is not known exactly when the neophytes arrived. The principal tribe at the mission was the Coco from the lower Colorado (Arriivita, Crónica, II, 336, 337, 1792). Some time before Mar. 11, 1751, Capt. Joseph de Eca y Musquiz inspected the mission and reported at service 102 neophytes (ibid., 328; Viceroy's decree, Mar. 11, 1751, MS. in Lamar papers). This mission had an unfortunate career. About Dec. 1751, Capt. Rábago y Terán reported the neophytes as already reduced to 25 (Bonilla in Tex. Hist. Ass'n Quar., VIII, 49, 1905). Early in 1752 the Coco took umbrage at the punishment of a slight offense and left in a body for their home on the Colorado (Arriivita, op. cit., 333). A few days afterward Father Ganzabal, minister at San Ildefonso, who had quarreled with the captain of the presidio, was murdered in the door of the Candelaria mission by an unknown person. Later the Coco promised to return to their mission, but apparently they never did so, for the last of the three, San Xavier de Horcasitas, was soon abandoned (ibid., 333, 336). They were taken instead, it seems, to San Antonio de Valero mission, for, beginning in 1755, there were numerous burials there of Coco who had been baptized at Candelaria on Rio San Xavier (Valero, MS. Entierros, entries for the years 1755-1765). (H. E. B.)

Candelaria.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 641, 1886.

Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria. A mission founded Feb. 8, 1762, by Capt. Felipe Rábago y Terán and Fray Diego Ximinez, on the w. side of San Joseph r., now the upper Nueces (not the San Antonio, as has been conjectured), near a site called El Cañon. This mission and San Lorenzo, which was 4 leagues away, were founded for the Lipan after they had been frightened from the San Saba mission by the attack of the Comanche and others in 1758. The chief who asked for this mission and was made "governor" of it was Texa, or Turnio, who had a following of more than 300 people (Report of Rábago y Terán, Feb. 7 and 8, MS. in Archivo General; also Arricivita, Crónica, II, 385, 386, 1792). The mission was attached to those of the Rio Grande. Before 1767 it was abandoned through the desertion of Turnio and his people (Arricivita, ibid., 391). For further details, see San Lorenzo. (H. E. B.)

Candelaria.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 650, 1886. Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria.—Rábago y Terán, Report of the founding, Feb. 7, 8, 1762, MS. in Archivo General.

Nuestra Señora de la Luz. A Franciscan mission established by the Zacatecan friars, among the Arkokisa, on the left bank of lower Trinity r., Tex. A mission for the Arkokisa was proposed as early as 1747 by Capt. Orobio y Basterra, who reported that this tribe, living in five rancherías or pueblos and numbering 300 families, had expressed a desire to settle in a mission between the Sabine and the Trinity, "their fatherland." Some years afterward the plan was carried out, the mission being placed at a site known as Orcoquisac, some distance below modern Liberty. Near it stood the presidio of San Agustín de Ahumada. Within a few years both were moved a short distance upstream to a place called Los Horconitos. The mission, from the first unsuccessful, was abandoned about 1770, and in 1772 the suppression of the presidio was ordered. (H. E. B.)

Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción. A Franciscan mission, founded July 7, 1716, at the principal Hasinai village, that of the Hainai, on the E. side of Angelina r., Tex., and nearly W. of modern Nacogdoches. It was founded by, and remained for several years in charge of, the president of the Querétaran missions among the Hasinai, Fray Ysidro Felis de Espinosa, later author of the famous work on Franciscan missions, the Crónica Apostólica y Scríptica (1746). The Hainai settlement at the time the mission was founded consisted, it is said, of "an infinite number of ranches, with their patches of maize, melons, watermelons, beans, tobacco," and sunflowers (Ramón, Derrotero, 1716, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVII, 158). This village was for the missionaries a strategic point in the Hasinai country, for at the Hainai village was the chief temple of the confederacy, presided over by the high priest, the great Xinesi (Jesus María, Relación, 1691, MS.), consequently Concepción was made the head mission. Before its removal to San Antonio the mission was sometimes called Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción de los Aynais. The first church and dwellings were built by the Indians of wood and grass, after the manner of the Hasinai grass lodges, but soon the soldiers and the missionaries, with their own hands, constructed more commodious ones (Ramón, op. cit., 159; Espinosa, Diario, 1716, MS.; and Crónica, 418, 419, 1746).

The Hasinai Indians were friendly, but they refused to settle permanently in pueblos, and, through the strong influence of their priesthood, were slow to accept baptism. However, within a year Espinosa succeeded in baptizing, on his deathbed, the Hainai chief, which, because of this person's exalted position in the confederacy, presumably made other conversions easier (Espinosa, Crónica, 440). But success was slight. Supplies for this and the neighboring missions failed to come, some of the soldier guard deserted, and finally, in 1719, the missionaries and soldiers, unaided by home authorities and fearful of a French attack from Natchitoches incident to the rupture between France and Spain, retired with the church ornaments to San Antonio, much to the regret of the Indians (Espinosa, Crónica, 451-453; see also docs. in French, Hist. Coll. La., III, 67-72, 1851).

In 1721 the Marqués de San Miguel de Aguayo was sent, with Espinosa and Father Margil, to reestablish the missions and to erect presidios for their defense. Espinosa was again put in charge of Concepción, which reoccupied the old church after some repairs were made. On Aug. 8, 1721, the mission was formally reestablished, and to Cheocas, chief of the Hainai and head civil chief of the Hasinai, Aguayo gave "the best suit that he had—blue, heavily embroidered with gold, with waistcoat of gold and silver lace." Cheocas collected the Hainai people, and Aguayo, after exhorting them to come and settle a pueblo, gave presents of clothing and trinkets to 400 persons, including perhaps the 80 Kadohadacho visitors who chanced to be there (Peña, Diario, 1721, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVIII, 42). Near by Aguayo established an ill-made presidio called Nuestra Señora de los Dolores de los Texas (Peña, ibid.; and Rivera, Diario, leg. 2140, 1736; also Rivera, Proyecto, 1728, MS.).

Success was no greater now than formerly, and in 1731 Mission Concepción, together with San Joseph de los Nasones and San Francisco de los Texas (or Neches), was reestablished on San Antonio r. It was first planned to place them on the San Marcos, and there is some indication that they may have been temporarily located there (MS. in the city clerk's office, San Antonio, dated Aug. 12, 1771). Concepción was placed on the bank of San Antonio r., about 2 m. below San Antonio de Valero, which is now at the center of the city of San Antonio. According to the surviving book of marriage records, it was founded May 5, 1731. The site selected was that which formerly had been assigned to the Ervillame mission of San Xavier de Naxera (q. v.). The pueblo was called Acuña, and of it the Pajalat chief was made the first governor (Testimonio de Asiento de Misiones, 1730-31, MS.). The mission now sometimes took the name Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción de Acuña.

The tribes served by it were in the main of the Coahuiltecan stock. Their language is preserved in the Manual of Bartolome García (1760), who was stationed at the neighboring mission of San Francisco de la Espada. The first marriage recorded was that of "Joseph Flores, of the Patumaco nation, present governor of this pueblo, and chief of the Pajalates, Siquipiles, Tilpacopales, and others." The marriage records show that about 30 so-called tribes (naciones) were represented at this mission before 1790. They are here given, with the date of the first appearance of each new name or group of names following: Pajalat, Siquipil, Tilpacopal, Patumaco, Pachalague, Patalca, Tibja, Xarame (1733); Pamacho (Pamaque?), Cujan (1734); Pacaba (Pacosa? 1735); Guapica (Guapite?), Pauwana (1736); Payaya (1739); Patisia (1741); Pazo, Tacame, Orejon (1742); Chayopin (1745); Venado (1746); Apache (1747); Lijan (1751); Sanpao (1755); Piguqui, Manos de Perro (1756); Yojuan (1758); Pajalache (Pajalat? 1759); Malaquita (1764); Borrado, Copano (1767); Comanche (1770); Panique (1775). Of these the Pajalates, Orejones, Pacasos, Pacuas, Pauwanas, Tacames, Venados, Paniques, Pihuquers, Borrados, Sanpacos, and Manos de Perro are named in García's Manual as among those speaking Coahuiltecan, and several others are known to have been likewise Coahuiltecan. It is possible that two or three pairs of the names given above are those of identical tribes. It is also to be noted that the Apache and the Yojuanes in most cases were captives, while the Pacas and Chayopin in the list represent neophytes of neighboring missions who intermarried with the neophytes of Concepción (Libro de Censos, MS. in the custody of the Bishop of San Antonio).

By Feb. 20, 1740, 250 neophytes had been baptized; but at this date only 120 remained, of whom all but 6 were unbaptized. The explanation is that in the latter part of 1739 a severe epidemic had ravaged all the missions, immediately after which a fresh supply of gentiles was brought in (Descripción de Misiones, Feb. 20, 1740, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 203). By Mar. 6, 1762, there had been 792 baptisms and 558 burials—a commentary on mortality at the missions. At this time there were 207 persons remaining, largely Pajalates, Tacames, and Sanpacos. There were now a substantial church, apparently the one still standing, a sacristy, cloisters, a work-room where neophytes made cotton fabrics, and a blacksmith shop. The Indian pueblo near by consisted of two rows of stone huts and jacales, surrounded by a wall. The fields were irrigated by means of an acequia leading from a reservoir. On the ranch were 200 mares, 110 horses, 610 cattle, and 2,200 sheep and goats (Informe de Misiones, Mar. 6, 1762, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 168-169). The acequia, known as the "Pajalache or Concepción ditch," is said to have been in use until 1869 (Corner, San Antonio de Bexar, 43, 1890).

Late in 1772 or early in 1773 the Querétaran friars transferred the mission to the Zacatecans, as was true also of the neighboring missions (Libro de Censos, MS., first entry for 1773). But the active period of the mission was now past, and the subsequent history was that of decline. Neophytes were difficult to get, government support was withdrawn, and the citizens of San Fernando encroached upon the mission lands. In 1794 the mission was secularized. By 1790 the total number of marriages had reached 249, of which 210 had been contracted before 1770 (Libro de Censos). The mission church and vivienda are still fairly well preserved. (H. S. N.)

Nuestra Señora de la Soledad. The thirteenth Franciscan mission founded in California. Father Laven himself had explored the region, already known to the Spanish as Soledad, and personally selected the site, which was situated in the Salinas valley, about 4 m. from the present town of Soledad, Monterey co. The native name was Chuttusgelis. Some shelters were erected by neophytes from San Carlos, and on Oct. 9, 1791, the mission of Nuestra Señora de la Soledad was formally established. A few natives witnessed the ceremony. By the end of the year there were 12 converts, and 493 by 1800. In 1797 they had completed an adobe church with straw roof. The greatest number of neophytes, 727, was reached in 1806. In 1810 there were 600, in 1820 435, and about 300 in 1834. The total number of natives baptized was 3,096, of whom 1,308 were children. The total deaths were 2,502, of whom 1,137 were children. The mission was successful in its agricultural operations and well supplied with stock. In 1810 it had nearly 3,000 cattle, 286 horses, and 8,000 sheep, with an average crop for the last decade of 3,600 bushels. By 1820 the livestock had increased considerably, but the crops were smaller. Soledad did not decline so rapidly as some of the other California missions, and in 1834 it still had about 6,000 cattle and 5,000 sheep. The crops, however, were not very good, though there was a certain amount of irrigation. After secularization the decline was rapid, so that in 1840 there were only about 70 natives left, and the livestock had almost entirely disappeared. In 1846 the mission was sold for $800, but its buildings were then in ruins. Portions of adobe walls, some of them 3 ft thick, still remain on the site. The Indians in the neighborhood of Soledad were Chalones, belonging to the Costanoan linguistic stock. In 1817, or thereabouts, according to information given to Taylor (Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860), approximately a fourth of the neophytes were Chalones, one-fourth Esselen, and one-half from the Tulare lakes. The latter were probably Yokuts (Mariposan). See California Indians, Costanoan Family, Mission Indians of California, Missions. (A. B. L.)

Nuestra Señora de la Soledad. An Apalachee mission settlement established in 1718 near Pensacola, Fla., by Juan Marcos, chief of the tribe, with refugees rescued from captivity among the Creeks, by whom they had been carried away on the destruction of the Apalachee missions by Gov. Moore and his Indian allies in 1704. The effort seems to have been abandoned before 1722. (J. M.)

Nuestra Señora de la Victoria. A Franciscan mission founded in 1677 at Naladores, within the territory of the present state of Coahuila, Mexico. It was called also Santa Rosa, and familiarly Naladores. Raids by the Toboso, a wild tribe of northern Mexico, compelled removal from its first site, 40 leagues S. E. of Coahuila, to a position near Naladores r., 7 leagues S. W. of that city. The Indians collected here were the Cotzales and Manos Prietas, to which, after the removal, 8 Tlascaltec families were added. (J. K. S.)

Nuestra Señora de los Dolores de la Punta. A mission founded by the Querétaran fathers within the limits of the present Mexican state of Nueva Leon. The Indians gathered here were the Pitas and the Pasalves.

Nuestra Señora de los Dolores del Norte. A desert mission of Lower California, founded early in the 18th century. Venegas, Hist. Cal., in 198-199, 1759, says: "This mission was joined with that of San Ignacio. Within its district, which lies 30 leagues from S. Ignacio, San Ignacio de Kalakamat, and in the latitude of 29°, were already 248 baptized Indians." Taylor states that this mission was made as an adjunct to San Ignacio, but a few years afterward seems to have been absorbed into this last and abandoned, as were two or three pioneer foundations of the same kind, before 1740." See also Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 50, 1869.

Nuestra Señora de los Dolores de los Ais. A Franciscan mission established in 1716 by the Spaniards among the Eyeish, in the vicinity of Sabine r., Tex., 37 leagues from Natchitoches, La., "well toward the E., and near the French settlements already established on Red r." of Louisiana. It was abandoned during the French-Spanish hostilities of 1719 and the mission property destroyed by the Indians, but was reestablished in 1721 with 180 natives. In 1768 it reported only 11 baptisms, and in 1773 was abandoned, probably on account of the decimation of the Eyeish people. See Bancroft, cited below; Garrison, Texas, 1903.

Nuestra Señora del Pilar de los Adaes. A presidio established in Sept. and Oct. 1721, by the Marqués de Aguayo, close to the mission of San Miguel de Linares (or de los Adaes), in Texas, and about three-quarters of the way from the Sabine to Natchitoches, La. It was occupied until 1773, when the whole eastern frontier was abandoned. In 1774, however, part of the citizens returned from San Antonio to the Trinity and there founded a village which was called Pilar de Bucareli. (H. E. B.)

Nuestra Señora del Refugio. A mission founded in 1791 by Fray Manuel de Silva, near the mouth of Mission r., flowing into Aransas bay, Tex. It had 62 Karankawa neophytes in 1793. It was maintained until 1828, but in 1824 the mission buildings were abandoned because of the hostility of the Comanche, the baptism of neophytes subsequent to this time being performed at the parochial church. Between 1807 and 1828 the missionaries laboring at Refugio were Fr. José Manuel Gaitan, Fr. Juan María Zepulveda (buried there June 28, 1815), Fr. José Antonio Díaz de León, and Fr. Miguel Muñoz. During this period the total number of baptisms was 204, the tribes represented being the Karankawa, Piguique, Copane, Copete, Pamoque, Cujan, Malaguite, Palache, Tlaseo, Coxo, Araname, and Lipan. Nuestra Señora del Rosario. A Franciscan mission founded in the fall of 1754 about 4 m. S. W. of Espiritu Santo de Zuñiga mission, nearly opposite modern Goliad and $\frac{1}{2}$ m. from San Antonio r., for the Karankawan tribes, particularly the Cujanes (Kohani), of the Texas coast below this point. Early missionary efforts among the Karankawan tribes had been made at Espíritu Santo, founded in 1722 by the Zacatecan Franciscans near the site of La Salle's settlement on Lavaca r. The hostility of these tribes soon caused the removal of the mission, and subsequently the neighboring presidio, Bahía del Espíritu Santo, to Guadalupe r. The site is now marked by ruins in Mission valley, Victoria co. From this time until 1750 the Karankawan tribes, except the Coco, some of whom before this were attracted to Candelaria mission, were almost unaffected by mission influence; but in the year named, in consequence of José de Escandón's plan to colonize the whole coast country from Pánuco, Mexico, to San Antonio r., renewed efforts were made to missionize them. At first the government ordered that an attempt be made to gather them into Espíritu Santo de Zuñiga mission, which, at Escandón's instance, had been moved in 1749 with the presidio of Bahía to San Antonio r. At the same time the Querétaran missionaries at San Antonio made an effort to gather them there. A quarrel ensued, with the result that Espíritu Santo mission, profiting by the efforts of the Querétarans, succeeded in 1751 in gathering temporarily a number of Karankawans, mainly Cujanes. They deserted in a few weeks, but the missionaries and Captain Ramírez de la Piszina of the presidio continued making efforts to win the Cujanes, Karankawa, Coapites, and Copanes (Kopano).

It being found objectionable to attempt to put these tribes into the Espíritu Santo mission with the Aranames and Tamiques, "since they are of different languages, incompatible dispositions, and do not like to be in their company," an effort was made and permission obtained to transfer mission Nuestra Señora de los Dolores de los Ais from E. Texas to the neighborhood of Espíritu Santo, there to reestablish it for the Karankawan tribes. Objections from E. Texas, however, resulted in an order (Apr. 7, 1755) to found a new mission for the Cujanes (Kohani), Coapites, and Karankawa. The Copanes (Kopano) do not seem to have been included. Already, in consequence of the former plan, the founding of a new mission for these tribes had been begun (Nov. 1754) by Father Camberos and Captain Ramírez de la Piszina. Without waiting for the government to supply funds, work was begun with private donations and borrowed means. The name given the mission was Nuestra Señora del Rosario, with the addition, sometimes, of "de los Cujanes," the addition indicating the prominence of the Cujan tribe in the mission, and also the prevalent usage of the name of this tribe as a generic term for the Karankawan group. As first constructed, the church was built of wood, and was surrounded by a stake palisade. Later this church was replaced by one of stone. Conversions were slow, the total number of baptisms after four years' work being only 21. The Cujanes in particular were hard to manage, and with difficulty were kept from deserting. Adequate government support for the mission was delayed until Apr. 1758, when the supplies that had been asked for were granted, and 10 additional soldiers were added to the garrison at the neighboring presidio. With this aid the mission became more prosperous. In 1768 it was able to report a total of about 200 baptisms, and the indications are that at this time from 100 to 200 Indians lived intermittently, at least, at the mission. Father Solís inspected the mission in that year and reported it in good material condition, but said that the Indians were very hard to subdue, and that the Copanes, some of whom had joined the other tribes there, had entirely deserted it. In the same year charges were made to the government that the Indians were being seriously mistreated by the missionary, Father Escobár, and for that reason were deserting. Solís, however, gave a contrary report. (For a study of the history of Mission Rosario to this point, with citation of authorities for the above statements, see Bolton in Texas Hist. Ass'n Quar., Oct. 1906.) The subsequent history of this mission has never been investigated. Viceroy Revilla Gigedo tells us that it was completely abandoned in 1781; that efforts were made at once to reestablish it, but without success until 1791 (Carta dirigida á la Corte de España, Dec. 27, 1793). Portillo (Apuntes para la Historia Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 310-11), an unreliable writer, who however had access to documents, says that in 1794 it had 62 neophytes (some of them apparently Coco), and that three years later 97 Coco and Karankawa from the mouth of the Colorado, after failing to gain admission to Espíritu Santo, entered Rosario mission. Ruins of the latter are still to be seen, but little remains of its walls. (H. E. B.)

Pop., according to Dr Simpson, 309 in 1853; according to Petroff, 200 in 1880; according to Murdoch, 150 or 160 in 1883; according to Kelly, less than 100 in 1890; 152 in 1900, including Ongovehenok, a winter village on Kugrua r., and the refuge and whaling station.

Kokmullit.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884 (corrupted from Kunmudlin, 'distant ones', used by the Eskimo of Norton sd.). Noowoo.—Kelly, Arct. Eskimos, 14, 1890. Noo'wooh.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 476, 1906 (quoted form). Noowook.—U. S. Coast Surv. map, 1898. Nuwuk.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 43, 1892.

Nuwukmiut ('people of the point'). An Eskimo tribe of Pt Barrow, Alaska. They belong in race and language to the pure Eskimo stock, and are small in stature, robust and muscular, with full faces, spare bodies, shapely hands and feet, low, broad foreheads, narrowing toward the crown; short, broad noses, high cheek bones, full lips, especially the under one; cheeks often ruddy, and a skin of yellowish brown, varying in some to a brunette almost European, in some to a coppery hue. Their eyes are brown, of various shades, often bright and handsome. The hair is black, perfectly straight, and thick, but short; beards scanty. They are not prolific, and are dying out. Gray hair is uncommon, but wrinkles appear early. The large, regular teeth are worn away by the various uses to which the Eskimo put them, and few of either sex reach the age of 60. Pop. 43 in 1900. Their villages are Isutkwa, Nuwuk, Pernyu, Ongovehenok, and Sinaru.

Kokmalect.—Kelly, Arct. Eskimos, 14, 1890 (given as the name of the old Eskimo dialect of the Arctic coast tribes from Icy cape to Pt Barrow). Noowoo Mutes.—Kelly, ibid., chart. Nugumut.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. in Am., i, 74, 1847. Nuwukmūt.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 11, 1877. Nuwung-mé-un.—Richardson, Polar Regions, 300, 1861. Nuwū'āmiun.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 43, 1892.

Nyack (Naiag, 'point', 'corner'). A former village, probably of the Unami division of the Delawares, on the w. bank of Hudson r. about the present Nyack, in Rockland co., N. Y. The tract was sold and the Indians were removed in 1652.

Naiack.—Schoolcraft in Proc. N. Y. Hist. Soc., 107, 1844. Naiack.—Doc. of 1652 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xiv, 190, 1883. Najack.—Doc. of 1660, ibid., xiii, 167, 1881. Najeck.—Treaty of 1660, ibid., 148. Najeck.—Doc. of 1656, ibid., xiv, 365, 1883. Nay- ack.—Deed of 1657, ibid., 394. Nayeck.—Treaty of 1645, ibid., XIII, 18, 1881. Neyiak.—Doc. of 1649, ibid., 25. Nyacka.—Clark, Onondaga, I, 18, 1843. Nyeck.—Treaty of 1645 quoted by Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 118, 1872.

Nyack. A settlement in 1680, presumably of the Canarsee, about the present site of Ft Hamilton, Kings co., w. Long id., N. Y. At a later period the occupants removed to Staten id., near by. See Ruttenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 92, 1906.

Nyhatta. An unidentified tribe of Louisiana, apparently populous, met three days' journey up Tassenocogoula (Red) r. from the Huma village in 1699.—Iberville in Margry, Déc., iv, 179, 1880.

Ny Herrhut. An Eskimo settlement and German Moravian missionary post near Godthaab on the w. coast of Greenland.

New Herrhut.—Kane, Arct. Explor., I, 453, 1856. New Herrhut.—Thompson, Moravian Miss., 203, 1886. Ny Herrhut.—Nansen, First Crossing, II, 172, 1890.

Nyhongoulas. One of the 7 Taensa villages in the 17th century.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., iv, 179, 1880.

Nyuchirhaan ('openings'). The present Tuscarora village near Lewiston, Niagara co., N. Y. (J. N. B. H.)

Gā-a-no'-ga.—Morgan, League Iroq., 428, 1851 ('on the mountains': Seneca name). Gā'-a-no'-geh.—Ibid., 469. Gā-ā-nó'-ge'.—J. N. B. Hewitt, inf'n, 1886 (Seneca form). Ga-o-no'-geh.—Morgan, op. cit., 452. Nyu-tair-hā''ā.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886 (Tuscarora name; tc=ch).

Nzatzahatko (N'zatzahatkō, 'clear water'). A village of the Ntlakyapamuk on Fraser r., Brit. Col., just below Cisco.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 5, 1899.

Oahgwadaiya (Hot Bread). A Seneca chief who signed the deed to the Tuscarora, Mar. 30, 1808, being then called Captain Hot Bread. The name of another Hot Bread appears on this deed. Oahgwadaiya was short and dark, a leading man and orator, and was chief of a village opposite Avon, N. Y., in 1790, when he was called Gwakwadia. In 1797 his name appears as Ahquatieya. He died of smallpox. (W. M. B.)

Oakfuskee. A former Upper Creek town on both sides of Tallapoosa r., Ala., about 35 m. above Tukabatchi, possibly on the s. boundary of Cleburne co., where a village of the same name now stands. The Oakfuskee Indians on the E. bank of the river came from 3 villages: Chihlakonini, Huhlitaiga, and Chukablako. In 1799 Oakfuskee, with its 180 warriors and 7 branch villages on the Tallapoosa (with 270 warriors), was considered the largest community of the Creek confederacy. The 7 villages were Atchinaalgi, Imukfa, Ipi-sogi, Niuyaka, Sukaispoka, Tallahassee, Tukabatchi, and Tukhtukagi. (A. S. G.)

Akfaski.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 139, 1884; II, 185, 1888. Lower Oakfuske.—Bartram, Trav., 461, 1791. Oakbusky.—Finnelson (1792) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., I, 289, 1832 (misprint). Oakfuskiea.—Drouseaux (1792), ibid., 312. Oak- fusky.—Flint, Ind. Wars, 202, 1833. Oakiuakees.—Niles (1760) in Mass. Hist. Coll., 4th s., v, 555, 1861. Oakpuakee.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1827), 420, 1837. Oo-fus-kee.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 45, 1848. Ockfuskee.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. Oek-fusaet.—Lattré, map U. S., 1784. Okfusk.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 139, 1884; II, 185, 1888. Ok-whûs-ke.—Adair, Am. Inds., 257, 1775. Upper Oakfuske.—Bartram, Travels, 461, 1791.

Akfaski.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 139, 1884; II, 185, 1888. Okfusk.—Ibid.

Oakfuskudshi ('little Oakfuskee'). A former small Upper Creek village on Tallapoosa r., 4 m. above Niuyaka and 24 m. above Oakfuskee, in E. Ala. The town was destroyed by Gen. White in 1813. It is probable that the people were colonists from Little Oakfuskee (Chihlakonini) on Chattahoochee r., which was destroyed by the Georgians in 1793. See Chihlakonini.

Little Ockfuske.—Pickett, Hist. Ala., 557, 1896. Little Okfusk.—Pickett, Hist. Ala., II, 299, 1851. Oo-fus-ooo-che.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 51, 1848. Okfuskū'dahi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 140, 1884.

Oapars. A former Papago rancheria between San Xavier del Bac and the Gila r. in s. Arizona; visited by Father Garcés in 1775, and by Anza and Font in 1780.

Ditt-pax.—Anza and Font (1780) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889. Oapars.—Arri-civita, Crónica Seráfica, II, 416, 1792. Oitapars.—Anza and Font (1780) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889. Oytapars.—Garcés (1775), Diary, 64, 1900. Oytapayta.—Anza and Font (1780) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889. Pueblo viejo.—Ibid.

Oat (Öüt). The Raccoon clan of the Caddo.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896.

Oatka (O'-ät-ka). A former small Seneca village on the site of Scottsville, on the w. bank of Genesee r., Monroe co., N. Y.—Morgan League Iroq., 434, 468, 1851.

O'Bail. See Cornplanter.

Obaldaquini. A mission village, probably on the lower Georgia coast, which was among those that revolted against the Spaniards in 1687.—Barcia, Ensayo, 287, 1723.

Obayos. A tribe formerly living in the province of Coahuila, N. E. Mexico, and gathered into the mission of San Francisco de Coahuila a quarter of a league N. of Monclova (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 302, 1864). It was probably of Coahuiltecan speech.

O'Beal, O'Beel. See Cornplanter.

Obidgewong. A Chippewa and Ottawa settlement on the w. shore of L. Wolseley, Manitoulin id. in L. Huron, Ontario, containing 17 inhabitants in 1884, but reduced to 7 in 1906. Their reserve consists of 400 acres. They cultivate the soil, are good bushmen, and in winter cut ties and posts which they peel and sell in summer.

Obidgewong.—Canadian official form. Wabi'tig-wāyang.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905 (correct name).

Obodeus. Given by Ker (Travels, 195, 1816), as the name of a tribe living on upper Red r., apparently in w. Texas. Not identified, and probably imaginary.

Obozi. One of the 36 tribes of Texas said by Juan Sabeata, a Jumano Indian, to have lived in 1683 on "Nueces" r., 3 days' journey eastward from the mouth of the Conchos (Cruzate in Mendoza, Viage, MS. in Archivo General). It has not been identified, although some of the others in his list have been. The Nueces r. mentioned by him was not necessarily the modern Nueces. (H. E. B.)

Obsidian. A volcanic glass much used by the Indian tribes for implements and ornaments. It is generally black or blackish in color, but some varieties are brownish, reddish, and greenish in hue, and sometimes display mottled effects. Occasionally it is translucent, and in rare instances fully transparent. It is not found in the United States E. of the Rocky mts., but occurs in enormous bodies in Yellowstone Park, in California and Oregon, and to a lesser extent in Idaho, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, and in other western states. The more homogeneous masses of obsidian are easily broken up, and are flaked into desired shapes with less difficulty than any other kind of stone. Considerable evidence of the shaping of implements is observable in Yellowstone Park, especially in the vicinity of Obsidian canyon, where a body of nearly solid glass 100 ft or more in thickness, is exposed (Holmes). More extensive workings have been located in New Mexico, Arizona, and California, but no quarries of importance are known. Implements of obsidian are rare E. of the Rocky mts. Occasional flaked specimens have been found in the mounds, and a remarkable deposit of implements was discovered in a burial mound on Hopewell farm, near Chillicothe, Ohio. This deposit, unearthed by Moorehead in 1892 and now preserved in the Field Museum of Natural History, Chicago, consists of several hundred beautifully shaped blades of large size and remarkable conformation, as well as many smaller objects, not a few of which have been injured by exposure to fire on an earthen altar. The material is black throughout, though slightly translucent when seen in thin section. Its origin can not be determined. The nearest deposit of similar character in place is in the Yellowstone Park, 1,500 miles away; but as no trace of the manufacture of implements of this character has been found in that section, it seems probable that the material was brought from Mexico or from the Pacific coast, the known deposits in the former country, in the state of Hidalgo, being 1,600 m., and in the latter, Napa and other cos. in California, 2,000 m. away. Along with the obsidian implements were found many implements and ornaments made of copper, shell, and other substances obtained from distant localities.

Many exceptionally interesting objects made of obsidian are found in the Pacific states. These include beautifully shaped blades, probably used as knives (q. v.), obtained mostly from the living tribes, the larger measuring more than 30 in. in length and 5 in. in width; knife blades of sickle or hook shape from mounds near Stockton, Cal. (Meredith, Holmes), and large numbers of delicately shaped arrowpoints from the valley of the Columbia. The larger knives were intended for ceremonial rather than for ordinary use. Of these, Powers says: "There are other articles paraded and worn in this and other ceremonial dances which they will on no account part with, at least to an American, though they sometimes manufacture them to order for one another. One of these is the flake or knife of obsidian or jasper. I have seen several which were 15 in. or more in length and about 2½ in. wide in the widest part. Pieces as large as these are carried aloft in the hand in the dance, wrapped with skin or cloth to prevent the rough edges from lacerating the hand, but the smaller ones are mounted on wooden handles and glued fast. The large ones can not be purchased at any price, but I procured some about 6 in. long at $2.50 apiece. These are not properly 'knives,' but jewelry for sacred purposes, passing current also as money." More recent and detailed accounts are given by Goddard, Kroeber, and Rust. Kroeber describes at some length the use of the knives in ceremonies and refers to them as primarily objects of wealth. On account of its brittleness implements of obsidian were shaped usually by flaking, but rare specimens have been produced, or at least finished, by pecking and grinding. (See Stonework.)

Ocabo. A former Papago village in s. Arizona.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 19, 1863.

Ocana. A tribe or subtribe, perhaps Coahuiltecan, met by Massanet (Diario, in Mem. Nueva España, xxvii, 92, MS.) a short distance s. of Nueces r., Tex., in 1691, in a rancheria of Chaguan (Siaguan), Pastulac, Paac, and Queins Indians. In 1706 this tribe was represented at San Francisco Solano mission, near the Rio Grande. About the same time they were entering San Bernardo mission, near by, with the Canuas, Catuxanes, Pazchales, and Pomulumas (Morfi, Viage de Indios, 1777, in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4^a s., III, 442). In their gentile state they intermarried with the Zenizos (Baptismal Rec. of Mission Solano, 1706, partida 226, MS.). For their affiliation, see Terocodame, the leading tribe of the locality of the Mission Solano, with whom the Ocana were associated. An Ocana was baptized in 1728 at San Antonio de Valero mission, the successor of San Francisco Solano (ibid., 1728, partida 230). (H. E. B.)

Ocanes.—Rivera, Diario, leg. 2763, 1736.

Ocanahowan. A village where Spaniards are said to have been in 1611; situated five days' journey s. of Jamestown, Va. Perhaps identical with Occaneechi, q. v. Ocanahowan.—Smith (1629), Va., II, 11, repr. 1819. Ochanahoen.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 26, 1849.

Ocatameneton ('village of the gens who dwell at the foot of the lake'). An unidentified eastern Dakota band.

Ocatameneton.—Le Sueur (1700) in Margry, Déc., VI, 86, 1846. Ouatemaneons.—Neill, Hist. Minn., 170, 1858.

Occaneechi. A small tribe of the eastern Siouan group formerly residing in s. Virginia and n. North Carolina. Their history is closely interwoven with that of the Saponi and Tutelo, and there is historical evidence that their language was similar. The first known notice of the Occaneechi is that of Lederer, who visited them in 1670. They then dwelt on the middle and largest island in Roanoke r., just below the confluence of the Staunton and the Dan, near the site of Clarksville, Mecklenburg co., Va. Their fields were on the n. bank of the river, where they raised large crops of corn, having always on hand as a reserve a year's supply. Between the date of this visit and 1676 they were joined by the Saponi and Tutelo, who settled on two neighboring islands. In 1676 the Conestoga sought shelter with them from the attacks of the Iroquois and English. They were hospitably received, but soon attempted to dispossess their benefactors, and, after a battle, were driven out. Being harassed by the Virginians and Iroquois, they left their island and fled s. into Carolina. In 1701 Lawson found them in a village on Eno r., about the present Hillsboro, Orange co., N. C. They combined later with the Saponi, Tutelo, and others. They were cultivators of the soil and traders. We are assured by Beverley that their dialect was the common language of trade and also of religion over a considerable region. They divided the year into the five seasons of budding or blossoming, ripening, mid-summer, harvest, and winter. They were governed by two chiefs, one presiding in war, the other having charge of their hunting and agriculture. Ceremonial feasting was an important feature of their social life. Their tribal totem was a serpent. Consult Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894. See Patshenin.

Occom, Samson. A Christian convert, called "the pious Mohegan," born in 1723. Converted to Christianity under the influence of Rev. E. Wheelock in 1741, he received in the family of that minister a good education, learning to speak and to write English and obtaining some knowledge of Latin and Greek, and even of Hebrew. Owing to ill health he did not complete the collegiate instruction intended for him. He was successively a school teacher in New London, Conn. (1748); preacher to the Indians of Long id. for some ten years; agent in England (1766-67) for Mr Wheelock's newly established school, where he preached with great acceptance and success; minister of the Brotherton Indians, as those Mahican were called who removed to the Oneida country in the state of New York (1786). On his death at New Stockbridge, N. Y., in 1792, Occom was greatly lamented. He is said to have been an interesting and eloquent speaker, and while in England delivered some 300 sermons. A funeral sermon on Moses Paul, a Mahican executed for murder in 1771, has been preserved in printed form. Occom was the author of the hymn beginning "Awaked by Sinai's Awful Sound," and of another, "Now the Shades of Night are Gone," which gave Bishop Huntington delight that the thought of an Indian was made part of the worship of the Episcopal Church; but it was omitted from the present hymnal. It was through his success in raising funds in England that Mr Wheelock's school was transferred from Lebanon, Conn., to New Hampshire, where it was incorporated as Dartmouth College. As a man, Occom exhibited the virtues and the failings of his race. He was a regularly ordained minister, having been examined and licensed to preach by the clergymen of Windham co., Conn., and inducted in 1759 by the Suffolk presbytery, Long id. His later years were marred by drunkenness and other vices, but on the whole his life was one of great benefit to his race, though Schoolcraft (Ind. Tribes, v, 518, 1855) praises him perhaps too highly. See J. Edwards, Observations on the Language of the Muhhekaneew Indians, 1789; W. De Loss Love, Samson Occom and the Christian Indians of New England, 1899. (A. F. C.)

Ocoow, Okow. The yellow pike perch (Lucioperca americana) of the northern great lakes, mentioned by Richardson in Franklin's Narrative (1823) and again in the Fauna Bor. Amer., II, 1836. The name has since been adopted in ichthyological works. It is from Cree okaw, cognate with Chippewa oka. (W. R. G.)

Ocha ('rain-cloud'). Given by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, II, 181, 1889) as a clan of the Mohave, q. v.

Ochechote (Tenino: 'hind dorsal fin [of a salmon]'). A small Shahaptian tribe, speaking the Tenino language, formerly living on the N. side of Columbia r., in Klickitat co., Wash. They were included in the Yakima treaty of Camp Stevens, Wash., June 9, 1855, by which, with other tribes, they ceded their lands to the United States. If any survive they are probably incorporated with other tribes on the Yakima res. Their name has reference to a rock on the N. side of Columbia r., opposite the upper end of an island near the mouth of the Des Chutes.

Ochecholes.—U. S. Stat., XII, 951, 1863. Uchi'-chol.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 740, 1896.

Ocheese ('people'). A former Seminole town on the W. side of Apalachicola r., at Ocheese bluff, the site of the present town of Ocheese, Jackson co., Fla. Pop. 220 in 1822, 230 in 1826.

Ocheeses.—Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 364, 1822. Ochesos.—Drake, Bk. Inds., IX, 1848.

Ocheese. A former Lower Creek town on the E. bank of Chattahoochee r., W. central Georgia.

Okesez.—Jeffreys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 176.

Ocheto. A town visited by De Soto in 1539-40, apparently in N. W. Florida, at the head of St Marks bay, 4 leagues from the gulf. Buckingham Smith identifies it with the Aute of Narvaez. It is not the Ocute of Biedma. See Gentleman of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 135, 1850.

Ochiakenen. A tribe or band mentioned by Hennepin (New Discov., 313, 1698) as living about 1675 in the same village with the Miami and Mascoutens. See Ochiata-gonga.

Ochiatagonga. An unidentified tribe mentioned by La Salle, in 1682 (Margry, Déc., II, 237, 1877) in connection with Islinois (Illinois), Chaouanons (Shawnee), and others, as among those living S. W. from L. Erie and destroyed (?) by the Iroquois. Cf. Ochiakenen.

Ochionagueras. An Onondaga war chief, called also Achiongeras, baptized by Father Le Moyne, Aug. 15, 1654, as Jean Baptiste, that being the name of Le Moyne's companion. He successfully led the Iroquois against the Erie. He headed Dablon's escort in Mar. 1656, and the next year was at Montreal in time to refute some Mohawk slanders. Ochionagueras was then described as an Onondaga captain, who "procured by his influence the peace which we have with the upper Iroquois." (W. M. B.)

Ochoyos. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Ochuceulga. A former Seminole town of 250 inhabitants E. of Apalachicola r., N. W. Fla. Cothrin was chief in 1822. The name is a form of Ochisi-algi. Cf. Ocheese.

O-ohuce-ulga.—Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 307, 1822.

Ochupocrassa. A former Seminole town on "East Florida point," with about 30 warriors in 1820, who had moved down from the Upper Creeks.—Bell quoted by Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 307, 1822.

Ocilla. A former Seminole town at the mouth of Ocilla r., once called Assilly cr., on the E. bank, in Taylor co., Fla. Latu-fixico was its chief in 1823.

Ocillee.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74, 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Ockneharuse. An unidentified tribe mentioned in 1747 as living in the Ohio valley, and said to number 1,500 or 2,000, exceeding both the Wea and the Mississauga in population (Doc. of 1747 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VI, 391, 1855). They were possibly the Miami.

Oclackonayahe. A former Seminole village "above Tampa bay," W. Fla.; probably on or near Okliakonkonhee lake, Polk co.—Bell quoted by Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822.

Oclawaha. A former Seminole town on Oclawaha r. in N. central Florida. The Oclawaha division of the Seminole, descended from the Yamasi, betray their origin by the dark color of the skin (McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, I, 272, 1854). Coe Hadjos Town (q. v.), which appears on Taylor's war map of 1839 just E. of Oclawaha r., may be the same.

Ocmulgee (Hitchiti: óki 'water', múlgis 'it is boiling': 'boiling water'). A former Lower Creek town at the "Ocmulgee old fields," along the E. bank of Ocmulgee r., probably in Pulaski co., Ga., which, according to Adair (Am. Ind., 36, 1775), the South Carolinians destroyed about 1715. According to Creek tradition (Bartram, Trav., 52, 1792) Ocmulgee "old fields" was the site of the first permanent Creek settlement after the migration of the tribe from the w. The Indian trading road passed through this settlement. The "old fields," on which are a number of artificial mounds, terraces, and earthen inclosures, extended along the river for 15 m. The people of the town, who are sometimes mentioned as a tribe, joined those of other settlements in Oct. 1738 in tendering to Oglethorpe their assurances of friendship. (A. S. G.)

Ocoee (Uwagd'hl, 'apricot-vine place'). A former important Cherokee settlement on Ocoee r., near its junction with the Hiwassee, about the present Benton, Polk co., Tenn.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 544, 1900.

Acohee.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Ocon. A town, probably of the Hitchiti, formerly on St Marks r., N. W. Fla.—Jefferys, French Dom. Am., 135, map, 1761.

Oconaluftee (from Egwánul'ti, 'by the river'; from egwád'ní 'river', núldí or nul'ti 'near', 'beside'). Mentioned by Bartram as a Cherokee town existing about 1775, probably on the lower course of the river of the same name, at the present Birdtown, on the East Cherokee res., N. C., where was formerly a considerable mound. (J. M.)

Egwánul'ti.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 517, 1900 (correct form). Oconaluftee.—Present map form. Oconulufte.—Bartram, Travels, 371, 1792.

Oconee. A small tribe of the Creek confederacy, probably of the Hitchiti division, formerly living on Oconee r., Ga. Oconee, their chief town, was situated, according to Hawkins, about 4 m. below the present Milledgeville. Weekachumpa their chief, known to the English as Long-king, and one of his warriors were among the Indians assembled to welcome Oglethorpe when he arrived in Georgia in 1732. The Oconee formed one of the parties to the treaty between the U. S. and the Creeks at Colerain, Ga., June 29, 1796. Oocouys.—Harris, Voy. and Trav., II, 335, 1764. Oconas.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 4, 29, 1848. Ocones.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1797), 69, 1837. Oconery's.—Moll, map in Humphrey, Acct., 80, 1730.

Oconee. A former small town on the E. bank of Chattahoochee r., in Georgia, according to Hawkins, and on the W. bank, in Alabama, according to Bartram. It was settled about 1710 by the Oconee who abandoned their old habitat on Oconee r., Ga. Later they established Cuscowilla town on a lake in Alachua co., Fla. According to Bartram, they spoke the "Stincard" language, and were therefore akin to the Hitchiti.

Ocoone.—Bartram, Travels, 462, 1791. Ocones.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 7, 1776. Oconis.—Romans, Florida, 90, 1775. Okonee.—Jefferys, op. cit., map 5. Okóni.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 67, 1884.

Oconee (Ukwá'ní). A former Cherokee settlement on Seneca cr., near the present Walhalla, in Oconee co., S. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 541, 1900. Acoonee.—Mouzon's map quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887. Oconnee.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., pl. clxi, 1900.

Oconi. A district (subtribe?) in Florida, about 1612, speaking a Timucuan dialect, according to Pareja (Arte Leng. Timuqua, 1886). An ancient Creek town in E. Georgia had the same name. See Oconee. (J. M.)

Oconostota (Á'ganú-stá'ta, 'Groundhog-sausage'). A Cherokee war chief in the 17th century. In the French war the Cherokee were at first allies of the English, but the spread of the British settlements and unfair and contemptuous treatment changed their sentiments. When they began to take reprisals for barbarous acts committed by American frontiersmen, and refused to surrender to the perpetrators, Gov. Littleton, of South Carolina, in Nov. 1759, cast into jail a delegation headed by Oconostota that had come to treat for the continuance of peace, saying that he would make peace in the Cherokee country. Attacullaculla obtained the exchange of Oconostota for one of the murderers demanded, and after the return of Littleton from a futile expedition the young war chief laid siege to Ft Prince George in upper South Carolina. He called out the commander, Lieut. Cotymore, for a parley and shot him, whereon the garrison butchered the Cherokee chiefs confined as hostages. Oconostota then fell upon the frontier settlements of Carolina, while the Cherokee warriors over the mountains captured Ft Loudon in Tennessee. Col. Montgomery at the head of 1,600 men relieved Ft Prince George and destroyed the lower Cherokee towns, then marched to the succor of Ft Loudon, but was routed in a fierce battle. After the war Oconostota became civil chief of the nation. The ancient war between the Cherokee and the Iroquois was terminated by a treaty which Oconostota went to New York to sign in 1768. The contest for their ancestral land, which caused their sympathies to swerve from the English to the French in the earlier war, made the Cherokee eager allies of the British against the Americans in the war of the Revolution. The tribe suffered severely in the contest and at its close Oconostota resigned the chiefship to his son, Tuxsi, 'The Terrapin.' He died about 1783. See Mooney, Myths of the Cherokee, 19th Rep. B. A. E., 1900.

Ocota (contraction of Okotsili, 'where there is resinous pine wood'). A small aggregation of Huichol ranches, containing a temple, situated near a small branch of the Rio Chapalagana, about 12 m. E. of the main stream, in Jalisco, Mexico (Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 16, map, 258, 1902). It is distinct from Guadalupe Ocotan.

Okotsili.—Lumholtz, ibid., 258 (proper Huichol name).

Ocotan. A former Tepehuane pueblo in Durango, Mexico, and seat of a Spanish mission.

Huk-tyr.—A. Hrdlicka, inf'n, 1906. Santa Maria de Ocotan.—Ibid. (present name of town). Santa Maria Ocotan.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 469, 1902. S. Francisco Ocotan.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

Octashepas. A tribe of the lower Mississippi, mentioned by Bossu in connection with the Taskiki (Tuskegee), Tonica (Tunica), Alibamu, etc. Possibly intended for Okchavi, q. v.

Oaktashippas.—Romans, Fla., 101, 1775. Octashepas.—Bossu (1759), Travels La., I, 229, 1771.

Ocuta. A town, probably in southern Georgia, entered by De Soto's troops on April 10, 1540. It was situated between Altamaha and Cofaqui.

Cofa.—Garciasso de la Vega, Florida, 112, 1723. Ocuta.—Gentil, of Elvas, 1557, in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 139, 1840; Biedma in Hakluyt Soc. Pub., IX, 179, 1851.

Odanah. A Chippewa settlement on Bad River res., Ashland co., Wis.—Brown in Wis. Archeol., v, 293, 1906; Ind. Aff. Rep., 394, 1906.

Odiserundy. A prominent warrior in the Revolution, often called John the Mohawk, and in chief command of a war party in 1777. The name is now written Deseronto, 'The lightning has struck.' In the New York State Library at Albany is a letter from John Deserontyon, dated Bay of Quinté, Nov. 1796, where he headed a band of Mohawk. He was present at a treaty with the United States after the Revolution. A place in Canada bears his name. (W. M. B.)

Odoesmades. A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, living in 1690 a short distance S. of the Rio Grande, on the way from central Coahuila to E. Texas. In the year named many of this tribe were seen in that locality, together with Mescaleros (evidently not the Mescalero Apache) and Momones, but when Terán went through the same country in 1691 he saw none. Many buffalo were seen here by Terán (Descripción y Diario Demarcación, 1691-92, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 25, MS.). (H. E. B.)

Odshiapofa ('hickory ground'). A town of the Creek Nation, on the North fork of Canadian r., below the mouth of Alabama cr., Okla. (Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888). The name was formerly applied to a Creek town in Alabama, otherwise known as Little Talasse. See Talasse.

Odshisalgi ('hickory-nut people'). One of the extinct clans of the Creeks. Some have regarded the name as representing simply the people of Ocheese, a former town of the Lower Creeks in central Georgia.

O-ché.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1878. Odshisalgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 156, 1884.

Odukeo's band (O-luk-e-o, 'Tall man'). The name of a Paviotso chief, applied also to his band formerly around Carson and Walker lakes, W. Nev. In 1861 they were said to number 1,261, including the Petodseka band.

Office of Indian Affairs. When the War Department was created by Congress under the act of Aug. 7, 1789, among the duties assigned to it were those "relative to Indian affairs." In 1824 a Bureau of Indian Affairs was organized in the War Department, with Thomas L. McKenney as its chief. The place was offered him at a salary of $1,600, but with the assurance that the President would recommend the organization of an "Indian department" with a salary for its head equal to that paid the auditors. The functions of the bureau were thus defined in the letter of appointment addressed to Col. McKenney by John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, dated Mar. 11, 1824:

"To you are assigned the duties of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in this department, for the faithful performance of which you will be responsible. Mr Hamilton and Mr Miller are assigned to you, the former as chief, the latter as assistant clerk. You will take charge of the appropriations for annuities and of the current expenses, and all warrants on the same will be issued on your requisitions on the Secretary of War, taking special care that no requisition be issued, but in cases where the money previously remitted has been satisfactorily accounted for, and on estimates in detail, approved by you, for the sum required. You will receive and examine the accounts and vouchers for the expenditure thereof, and will pass them over to the proper auditor's office for settlement, after examination and approval by you; submitting such items for the sanction of this department as may require its approval. The administration of the fund for the civilization of the Indians is also committed to your charge, under the regulations established by the department. You are also charged with the examination of the claims arising out of the laws regulating the intercourse with Indian tribes, and will, after examining and briefing the same, report them to this department, endorsing a recommendation for their allowance or disallowance. The ordinary correspondence with the superintendents, the agents, and sub-agents, will pass through your bureau."

Col. McKenney had had large responsibility in connection with Indian affairs as superintendent of Indian trade from Apr. 2, 1816, until the United States Indian trading establishment was abolished by act of May 6, 1822. His connection with the Bureau terminated Sept. 30, 1830, by his dismissal, according to his Memoirs, on political grounds. Samuel S. Hamilton held the position for about a year, and was succeeded by Elbert Herring.

By the act of July 9, 1832, there was created in the War Department the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, at a salary of $3,000, who, subject to the Secretary of War and the President, should have "the direction and management of all Indian affairs and of all matters arising out of Indian relations." Mr Herring received appointment as Commissioner July 10, 1832. Up to the present time (1907) there have been 28 Commissioners of Indian Affairs, the longest term of office being a little less than 8 years.

On June 30, 1834, an act was passed "to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs." Under this enactment certain agencies were established and others abolished, and provision was made for subagents, interpreters, and other employees, the payment of annuities, the purchase and distribution of supplies, etc. This may be regarded as the organic law of the Indian department.

When the Department of the Interior was created by act of Mar. 3, 1849, the Bureau of Indian Affairs was transferred thereto, and hence passed from military to civil control. As now organized there is a Commissioner of Indian Affairs (salary $5,000), an Assistant Commissioner ($3,000), a Chief Clerk ($2,250), a Superintendent of Indian Schools ($3,000), a private secretary to the Commissioner ($1,800), and a force of 175 clerks, including financial clerk, law clerk, chiefs of divisions, bookkeepers, architect, and draftsmen; besides 13 messengers, laborers, and charwomen.

The Finance division has charge of all financial affairs pertaining to the Indian Bureau. It keeps ledger accounts, under nearly 1,000 heads, of all the receipts and disbursements of appropriations and other funds for the Indian service, aggregating in late years more than $10,000,000 annually; remits funds to agents and other disbursing officers; attends to the purchase and transportation of supplies for the Indians and the work of the warehouses where these supplies are received and shipped; advertises for bids and prepares estimates for appropriations by Congress. The Treasury Department has estimated that between Mar. 4, 1789, and June 30, 1907, government expenditures on account of the Indian service aggregated $472,823,935. The Indian Office is trustee for more than $35,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States belonging to Indians, on which interest accrues at 4 percent and 5 percent.

The Field Work division has charge of all matters relating to irrigation; prosecutions for sale of liquor to Indians; assisting Indians in obtaining employment, and kindred subjects.

The Land division of the office has charge of everything pertaining to the landed interests of the Indians—allotments, patents, leases, sales, conveyances, cessions of land, or reservation of land for Indian use, railroad rights of way and damages; contracts with Indians for the payment of money; guardianship of minors; settlement of estates; trespassing on Indian reservations and the removal of white persons therefrom; taxation; citizenship and adoption into tribe, and all legal questions growing out of relations between Indians and whites.

The Education division has supervision of Indian school matters, records of school attendance, making plans for school buildings, including their lighting, heating, and sewerage; the selection of school sites, and the issuance of regulations as to the general management of the schools; prepares and supervises bonds of disbursing officers, and has charge of all matters relating to the appointment, transfer, promotion, etc., of employees in the agency and school service.

The Indian Territory division supervises all matters relating to the Five Civilized Tribes in Indian Ter., except railroads, telephones, and pipe-lines; also all timber matters except in the case of the Menominee res., which is in charge of the Land division.

The Accounts division audits the cash and property accounts of agents, school superintendents, and other disbursing officers; has the disposal of unserviceable property; the collection and expenditure of funds coming into the hands of agents from sales of agency property or produce or from other sources; the issuance of livestock, implements, and other supplies to the Indians; sanitary statistics; census; and the preparation and issuance of regulations for all branches of the service.

The Superintendent of Indian Schools inspects the schools personally, supervises methods of instruction, prepares the course of study, both literary and industrial, recommends text-books, and arranges for general and local Indian school institutes.

The Files division briefs, registers, indexes, and files all incoming and indexes all outgoing correspondence.

The Miscellaneous division has charge of business connected with Indian traders and field matrons, leaves of absence granted clerks, the printing required by the office, including the annual report, and the stationery and other supplies needed.

Five special agents and seven school supervisors report to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs their inspections of the work in the field. The employees under the jurisdiction of the office number about 5,000. The annual reports of the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior, with reports of agents, inspectors, and school superintendents, and with population, industrial, and other statistics pertaining to the Indians, are published by authority of Congress, and contain much valuable information respecting the various tribes.

For the organization of methods of the Indian service in the field through the agencies and schools, see Agency system, Education, Governmental policy, Reservations, Treaties. (M. S. C.)

Ofougoula (Choctaw: oji 'dog', okla 'people': 'dog people'). A small tribe which formerly lived on the left bank of Yazoo r., Miss., 12 m. above its mouth and close to the Yazoo, Koroa, and Tunica. They are not mentioned in any of the La Salle documents nor, by name at least, in the relations of the priest missionaries De Montigny and La Source who first visited the Yazoo tribes. In 1699 Iberville learned of them and recorded their name from a Taensa Indian among the Huma, but he did not reach their village either on this or on his subsequent expedition. It was probably during the same year that Davion established himself as missionary among the Tunica and necessarily had more or less intercourse with the tribes dwelling with them, i. e., the Yazoo and Ofougoula. Early in 1700 Le Sueur, with whom was the historian Pénicaut, stopped at the village of the combined tribes on his way to the headwaters of the Mississippi, and in November of that year Father Gravier spent some days there. He mentions the Ofougoula under their Tunica name, Ounspik (properly Ushpi), and states that they occupied 10 or 12 cabins. In 1729 Du Pratz gave the number of cabins in the united village of the Ofougoula, Yazoo, and Koroa, as 60. On the outbreak of the Natchez war the Yazoo and Koroa joined the hostiles, murdered their missionary, and destroyed the French post. The Ofougoula were off hunting at the time, and on their return every effort was made to induce them to declare against the French, but in vain, and they descended the Mississippi to live with the Tunica. There they must have continued to reside, for Hutchins, in 1784, states that they had a small village on the w. bank of the Mississippi, 8 m. above Pointe Coupée, La. Although the name afterward disappears from print, the living Tunica remember them as neighbors to within about 40 years. Their language being similar to that of the Choctaw, it is probable that the remnant has become confused with that tribe. (J. R. S.)

Oglala ('to scatter one's own'). The principal division of the Teton Sioux. Their early history is involved in complete obscurity; their modern history recounts incessant contests with other tribes and depredations on the whites. The first recorded notice of them is that of Lewis and Clark, who in 1806 found them living above the Brulé Sioux on Missouri r., between Cheyenne and Bad rs., in the present South Dakota, numbering 150 or 200 men. In 1825 they inhabited both banks of Bad r. from the Missouri to the Black hills, and were then friendly with the whites and at peace with the Cheyenne, but enemies to all other tribes except those of their own nation. They were then estimated at 1,500 persons, of whom 300 were warriors. Their general rendezvous was at the mouth of Bad r., where there was a trading establishment for their accommodation. In 1850 they roamed the plains between the n. and s. forks of Platte r. and w. of the Black hills. In 1862 they occupied the country extending n. e. from Ft. Laramie, at the mouth of Laramie r., on North Platte r., including the Black hills and the sources of Bad r. and reaching to the fork of the Cheyenne, and ranged as far w. as the head of Grand r. De Smet (Ind. Aff. Rep., 277, 1865) says: "The worst among the hostile bands are the Blackfeet, the Ogallalas, the Unkpapas, and Santees." The Oglala participated in the massacre of Lieut. Grattan and his men at Ft. Laramie in 1854. From 1865 they and other restless bands of western Sioux were the terror of the frontier, constantly attacking emigrant trains on the plains and boats on the river, fighting soldiers, and harassing the forts and stations during several years, under the leadership of Sitting Bull and Crazy Horse. The invasion of the Black hills by gold seekers led to the war of 1876, in which Custer and his command were destroyed. For several months previous thereto stragglers from other tribes had been flocking to Sitting Bull's standard, so that according to the best estimates there were at the battle of Little Crazy Horse and more than 2,000 followers surrendered at Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies in the May following. These different parties were composed in part of Oglala, of whom the larger part probably surrendered with Crazy Horse.

The Oglala entered into a treaty of peace with the United States at the mouth of Teton (Bad) r., S. Dak., July 5, 1825, and also a treaty signed at Ft Sully, S. Dak., Oct. 28, 1865, prescribing relations with the United States and with other tribes. An important treaty with the Oglala and other tribes was made at Ft Laramie, Wyo., Apr. 29, 1868, in which they agreed to cease hostilities and which defined the limits of their tribal lands. An agreement, confirming the treaty of 1868, was concluded at Red Cloud agency, Neb., Sept. 26, 1876, which was signed on behalf of the Oglala by Red Cloud and other principal men of the tribe.

In 1906 the Oglala were officially reported to number 6,727, all at Pine Ridge agency, S. Dak.

Lewis and Clark (Orig. Jour., vi, 99, 1905) mention only two divisions, the Sheo and the Okandandas. According to the Report of Indian Affairs for 1875 (p. 250), the Oglala were then divided into four bands, "usually called Ogallallas, Kioksies [Kiyouksa], Onkapas [Oyukhpe], and Wazazies." The Rev. John Robinson in a letter to Dorsey (1879) names the following divisions: Payabya, Tapishlecha, Kiyouksa, Wazhazha, Iteshieha, Oyukhpe, and Waglukhe. These correspond with the seven bands of Red Cloud's pictographs. According to Rev. W. J. Cleveland (1884) they consist of 20 bands, as follow: (1) Iteshieha; (2) Payabya; (3) Oyukhpe; (4) Tapishlecha; (5) Peshla; (6) Chekhulaton; (7) Wahlenieha; (8) Peshlaptechela; (9) Tashuahecha; (10) Iwayusota; (11) Wakan; (12) (a) Iglukatekhila, (b) Iteshieha; (13) Iteshiechaetanhan, (14) Kiyouksa; (15) Wachaponpa; (16) Wachape; (17) Tyocheshli; (18) Waglukhe; (19) Oglala; (20) Ieskaehincha. Unidentified bands are: Minisha, Night Cloud, Old Skin Necklace, Red lodge, and the Shorthair band. See Dakota, Teton. (J. O. D. C. T.)

Ojiataibues. A Maricopa rancheria on Gila r., Ariz., in the 18th century.

Ojia-taibues.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763), 22, 1863. Oxitahibuis.—Sedelmair (1744) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889. S. Iacobus de Oiadai-buise.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726.

Ojio. A former Sobaipuri rancheria visited by Father Kino in 1697; situated on the E. bank of San Pedro r. near its junction with the Gila, s. Arizona, not far from the present Dudleyville.

Ojio.—Bernal (1697) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1889. Victoria.—Ibid. Victoria de Ojio.—Kino (1697) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 280, 1856.

Ojiopas. The Piman name of apparently a Yuman tribe, members of which visited Father Kino while among the Quigyuma of the lower Rio Colorado in 1701. In all probability they are not the Bagiopa.

Ojistatara. An Oneida chief in 1776, popularly called The Grasshopper. His name appears as Peter Ojistarara in 1785, and among the Kirkland papers is a speech of The Grasshopper, addressed to Gov. Clinton of New York, Jan. 27, 1785. He was then principal chief, but died that year. There was a later chief of the same name. (W. M. B.)

Ojito de Samalayuca. A mission established among the Suma (q. v.), in 1683; situated 8 leagues below El Paso, in Chihuahua, Mexico.—Escalante (1775) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 192, 1889.

Ojo Caliente (Span.: 'warm spring'; native name, K'iapkwainakwin, 'place whence flow the hot waters'). A Zuni summer village about 14 m. s. w. of Zuni pueblo, N. Mex., not far from the ruined town of Hawikuh. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 96, 1891.

Agua Calientes.—Bandelier quoted in Arch. Inst. Rep., v, 43, 1884. Caliente.—Donaldson, Moqui Pueblo Inds., 127, 1893. Hos Ojos Calientes.—Cushing in Millstone, IX, 19, Feb. 1884 (misprint Hos for Los). K'iáp-kwai-na.—Cushing, ibid., IX, 55, Apr. 1884 (Zuni name). K'iáp'-kwai-na-kwe.—Ibid. (= 'people of the town whence flow the hot waters'). K'iáp kwai na kwin.—Cushing in 4th Rep. B. A. E., 494, 1886. Ojo Caliente.—Common map form. Ojos Calientes.—Cushing in Millstone, IX, 225, Dec. 1884. Tkáp-quē-nā.—Stevenson in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 542, 1887.

Oka. A modern village of Iroquois, Nipissing, and Algonkin, on L. of the Two Mountains, near Montreal, Quebec. Cuoq says oka is the Algonkin name for goldfish or pickerel (see Occow). The Iroquois name, Kanesatake, signifies 'on the hillside', from onesata 'slope or mountain side,' ke 'at or on.'

The village was settled in 1720 by Catholic Iroquois, who were previously at the Sault au Récollet, and who numbered about 900 at the time of removal. Soon after they were joined by some Nipissing and Algonkin, who removed from a mission on Isle aux Tourtes, the latter place being then abandoned. The two bodies occupy different parts of the village, separated by the church, the Iroquois using the corrupted Mohawk language, while the others speak Algonquian. The total number of both was 375 in 1884, and 461 (395 Iroquois, 66 Algonkin) in 1906. In 1881 a part of them removed to Watha (Gibson), Ontario, where they are now established, numbering 140, making the total number at both settlements about 600. For an account of these Indians see Life of Rev. Amand Parent, Toronto, 1886, in which the religious troubles are related from a Protestant point of view. (J. M. J. N. B. H.)

Okaaltakala ('between the waters'). A former Choctaw village that probably stood at the confluence of Petickfa and Yannubbee crs., in Kemper co., Miss.

Oka Altakala.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 424, 1902. Oka-altakkala.—West Florida map, ca. 1775. Oka attakkala.—Romans, Florida, 310, 1775.

Okachippo. A former Choctaw town in Mississippi. It was evidently in Neshoba co., but the exact location is not known. The name may be intended for Oka-shippa, 'water run down.'—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 430, 1902.

Oka chippo.—West Florida map, ca. 1775.

Okacoopoly. A former Choctaw town on Ocobly cr., Neshoba co., Miss., from which it probably derived its name. The name may have been Oka-akobli, 'water where the biting is,' referring to good fishing there.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 429, 1902.

Oka Coopoly.—West Florida map, ca. 1775.

Okaghawichasha ('man of the south'). A band of the Brulé Teton Sioux.

Okaga-wicata.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1897. Okaza-witocaa.—Ibid.

Okahoki (perhaps M'okahoki, 'people of the pumpkin place'). A Delaware band or subclan formerly living on Ridley and Crum crs. in Delaware co., Pa. In 1703 they were removed to a small reservation near Willistown Inn.

M'okahoki.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 39, 1885. O-ka-ho'-ki.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877 (said to mean 'ruler').

Okahullo ('mysterious water'). A former scattering Choctaw town on and near the mouth of Sanotee cr., Neshoba co., Miss., and extending into Newton co.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 425, 1902; Brown, ibid., 445.

Okak. A Moravian Eskimo mission on an island in Okak bay, coast of Labrador, established in 1776. The first Christian Eskimo convert in Labrador was baptized here in the same year. In 1851 the natives of the vicinity suffered severely from famine. It is still a flourishing station and the seat of an orphan asylum.

Okak.—Thompson, Moravian Miss., 229, 1890.

Ok-kak.—Hind, Labrador Penin., ii, 199, 1863.

O'Kok.—McLean, Hudson Bay, ii, 167, 1849.

Okakapassa. A former Choctaw town that environed the present Pinkney Mill in Newton co., Miss.—Brown in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 443, 1902. Cf. Acolapissa.

Little Colpissas.—Jefferys, French Dom. Am., map, 148, 1761. Oka Lopassa.—West Florida map, ca. 1775.

Okalusa ('black water'). The name of a settlement or of settlements of the Choctaw. On d'Anville's map of 1732 one is laid down on the s. side of Blackwater cr., Kemper co., Miss. There are the remains of several other villages along the same stream which may have borne this name at one time or another. The Oaka Loosa of Romans' map (1775) is not on this stream, however, but on White's branch, in the same county, where are still the remains of a town. It is possible that White's branch was also called Okalusa in Romans' time. This writer represents the Black Water warriors as predatory in their habits, often making inroads into the territory of the Creeks. In 1831 the Black Water people numbered 78.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., III, 367-368, 1900; VI, 420, 1902.

Black Water.—Jefferys, French Dom., I, 165, 1761. Oaka Loosa.—Romans, Florida, map, 1775. Ogue Loussas.—Jefferys, French Dom., I, 164, 1761. Oka Loosa.—Romans, Florida, 310, 1775. Okecoussa.—Lattre, Map U. S., 1784. Oke Lousa.—Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 420, 1902 (misquotation of d'Anville). Oké Loussa.—d'Anville's map in Hamilton, Colonial Mobile, 158, 1897. Oqué-Loussas.—Du Pratz, La., II, 241, 1758.

Okanagan Lake. The local name for a body of Okinagan on the w. shore of Okanagan lake in s. w. British Columbia; pop. 37 in 1901, the last time the name appears.

Helowna.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 166, 1901.

Okapoolo. A former Choctaw village probably in the present Newton co., Miss.—Romans, Florida, map, 1775.

Okatalaya (Oka-talaia, 'spreading water'). One of the Choctaw Sixtowns which controlled a large extent of territory in the present Jasper and Smith cos., Miss., but centered on Oka Talaia cr.—Halbert in Pub. Ala. Hist. Soc., Misc. Coll., I, 383, 1901.

Okawasiku ('coot'). A subphratry or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 42, 1896.

Okchayi. A former Upper Creek town on Oktchayi cr., a w. tributary of Tallapoosa r., 3 m. below Kailaidshi, in Coosa co., Ala. Its inhabitants were of Alibamu origin, as were also those of Okchayudshi. Milfort gives a tradition concerning their migration. Another Creek settlement of the same name was situated on the E. bank of Tombigbee r., at the ford of the trail to the Creek Nation, which was in a bend of the stream a few miles below Sukanatchi junction, probably in Sumter co., Ala. This was probably the mother town of the other Okchayi and of Okchayudshi. (A. S. G.)

Hook-choie.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 37, 1848. Hootchooe.—Hawkins (1813) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., I, 852, 1832. Oakchog.—Sen. Ex. State Pap., Ind. Aff., I, 32, 1832. Oakjoys.—Blount (1792), ibid., 270. Oocha.—Jefferys, French Dom. Am., I, 134, map, 1761. Ochoy.—Romans, Florida, 327, 1775. Ooka.—Alcedo, Dic. Geog., III, 361, 1788. Oockha.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. Oockhoys.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, III, 80, 1851. Ok-chai.—Adair, Am. Inds., 257, 273, 1775. Ookhoys.—Romans, Florida, 90, 1775. Oke-choy-atte.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, I, 266, 1851. Ookhoys.—Carroll, Hist. Coll. S. C., I, 190, 1836. Oukehaee.—Schermerhorn (1812) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., II, 18, 1814. Oxailles.—Milfort, Mémoire, 266, 1802. Ozeailles.—Pickett, Hist. Ala., I, 88, 1851.

Oktchayi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888.

Okchayudshi ('little Okchayi'). A former small Upper Creek town in the present Elmore co., Ala., on the E. bank of Coosa r., between Odshiapofa (Little Talassee) and Tuskegee. The village was removed to the E. side of Tallapoosa r. on account of Chickasaw raids.

Hook-choie-oo-che.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 37, 1848. Hookchoiooche.—Hawkins (1813) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 854, 1832. Little Oakchoy.—Creek paper (1836) in H. R. Rep. 37, 31st Cong., 2d sess., 122, 1851. Little Oakjoys.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1797), 68, 1837. Oakchoiooche.—Pickett, Hist. Ala., II, 267, 1851. Oktchayū'dahi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 141, 1884.

Oke. The principal village of the Ehatisaht (q. v.), on Eperanza inlet, w. coast of Vancouver id., Brit. Col.—Can. Ind. Aff., 264, 1902.

Okechumne. A former Moquelumnan group on Merced r., central Cal.

Ochekhamni.—Kroeber in Am. Anthropol., VIII, 659, 1906. Okechumne.—Wessells (1853) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 30, 1857.

Okehumpkee (probably 'lonely water'). A former Seminole town 30 m. s. w. from Volusia, and N. E. of Dade's battle ground, Volusia co., Fla. Mikanopy was chief in 1823, between which date and 1836 it was abandoned.

Oeahumpky.—Gadsden (1836) in H. R. Doc. 78, 25th Cong., 2d sess., 407, 1838. Okahumky.—Scott's map, ibid., 408-9. Okehumpkee.—H. R. Doc. 74, 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Oketo. The Yurok name of Big lagoon on the N. W. coast of Cal., 10 m. N. of Trinidad, as well as of the largest of the several Yurok villages thereon. (A. L. K.)

Okhatatalaya (Okhata-talaia, 'spreading pond'). A former Choctaw town in the westernmost part of the present Newton co., Miss. It was named from a pond several acres in extent, near the center of the town, which was a great resort for wild fowl.—Brown in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 445, 1902.

Okilisa (O-ki'-li-sa). An extinct Creek clan.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 155, 1884.

Okinagan (etymology doubtful). A name originally applied to the confluence of Similkameen and Okanogan rs., but extended first to include a small band and afterward to a large and important division of the Salishan family. They formerly inhabited the w. side of Okanogan r., Wash., from Old Ft Okanogan to the Canadian border, and in British Columbia the shores of Okanagan lake and the surrounding country. Later they displaced an Athapaskan tribe from the valley of the Similkameen. In 1906 there were 527 Okinagan on Colville res., Wash., and 824 under the Kamloops-Okanagan agency, British Columbia; total, 1,351. Gibbs in 1855 gave the following list of Okinagan bands on Okanogan r.: Tkwuratum, Ko-nekonep, Kluckhaitkwu, Kinakanes, and Milakitekwa. The Kinakanes appear to be the Okinagan proper. He also classed the Sanpoil with them, but says "these are also claimed by the Spokans," and in fact they are still oftener placed by themselves. To Gibbs' list should be added the Intietook band of Ross. The following villages or bands are enumerated in the Canadian Reports of Indian Affairs: Ashnola, Chuchunayha, Keremeus, Nkamaplix, Nkamip, Okanagan Lake, Penticton, Shennosquankin, and Spahamin. Teit gives four others: Kedlamik, Komkonatko, Ntlkius, and Zutsemin. Dawson adds Whatlminek. See also Skamoynumachx.

Kānk'utlā'atlam.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 10, 1889 ('flatheads': Kutenai name). Kinakanes.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 412, 1855. Kāknū'k'kē.—Chamberlain in 8th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 7, 1892 (Kutenai name). Oakanagans.—Ross, Fur Hunters, I, 44, 1855. Oaknacken.—Ross, Adventures, 287, 1847 (used collectively and also as applying to a subdivision). Oakinagan.—Cox, Columb. Okinoyoktokawik. A small Kaviagmiut Eskimo village on the coast opposite Sledge id., Alaska.—11th Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Okiogmiut. A name sometimes given collectively to the Eskimo of St Lawrence and the Diomede ids., Alaska. The former belong properly to the Yuit of Asia; for the latter, see Imaklimiut and Inguklimiut.

Island Inuit.—Dall in Proc. A. A. A. S., XXXIV, 377, 1885. Kokh'lit innūin.—Simpson quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 15, 1877. Okeog'-mūt.—Dall, ibid. Okeogmutes.—Dall in Proc. A. A. A. S., XVIII, 266, 1869. Okhaganak.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884.

Okiosorbik. A former Eskimo village on Aneretok fjord, E. Greenland; pop. 50 in 1829.

Okiosorbik.—Graah, Exped. E. Coast Greenland, 114, 1837.

Okisko. A chief of the Weapemeoc of Virginia, in 1585-86, who with Menatonon gave to Ralfe Lane most of the information communicated to Sir Walter Raleigh respecting the surrounding region. Although independent, Okisko was dominated to some extent by Menatonon, who induced him to acknowledge subjection to the English queen. Nevertheless Lane accused him of being the leader in the plot formed by his tribe, the Mandoag (Nottoway), and other Indians, to massacre the colonists. (C. T.)

Okitiyakni (Hitchiti: Oki-tiyákni, probably 'whirlpool' or 'river bend'). A former Lower Creek village on the E. bank of Chattahoochee r., 8 m. below Eufaula, in Quitman co., Ga. Pop. 580 in 1822.

Ootiyokny.—Woodward, Reminis., 107, 1859. O-he-te-yoe-on-noe.—Hawkins (1814) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., I, 859, 1832. Ora-tiokinans.—Morse, Rep. to Sec. Leg., I, 140, 1884.

Oklafalaya ('the long people'). One of the three great divisions into which the Choctaw (q. v.) were divided for at least a third of a century prior to their removal to Indian Ter. Originally it may have been the name of a town, extended in time to include all the settlements in the region in which it was situated. Unlike those in the eastern divisions, the Indians of this section were scattered in small settlements over a great extent of territory. "The boundary line separating this from the northeastern district began in the vicinity of the present little town of Cumberland, in Webster co. [Miss.]; thence ran southwesterly on the dividing ridge separating the headwaters of Tibbee (Oktibbeha) on the E. from the Big Black waters on the W. down to the vicinity of Dido, in Choctaw co.; thence in a zigzag course on the dividing ridge between the Noxubee and the Yokenookeny waters to the vicinity of New Prospect; thence it zigzagged more or less easterly between the headwaters of Pearl r. and the Noxubee waters to a point on the ridge not far S. of Old Singleton (not the present Singleton); thence southerly on the ridge between the Pearl r. waters on the W. and the Noxubee and Sukenatcha waters on the e.; thence somewhat westerly by Yazoo Town, in Neshoba co.; thence more or less southerly on the ridge between the headwaters of Talasha and the headwaters of Oktibbeha (there are two Oktibbeha crs. in Mississippi) to the ancient town of Kunshak-bolukta, which was situated in the s. w. part of Kemper co., some 2 m. from the Neshoba and about a mile and a half from the Lauderdale co. line. The line separating the western from the southeastern began at Kunshak-bolukta, first going a short distance northwesterly between the Talasha and Oktibbeha waters; thence it zigzagged more or less southwesterly on the dividing ridge between the Pearl and the Chickasawhay waters until it came to the vicinity of Lake Station, in Scott co. Mokalusha Town (Imoklasha), situated on the headwaters of Talasha cr., in Neshoba co., though somewhat s. of the regular line, belonged to the western district. From the vicinity of Lake Station the line ran southward on the dividing ridge between West Tallyhaly and Leaf r. down to the confluence of these two streams. Leaf r. from this confluence down to where it struck the Choctaw boundary line formed the remainder of the line separating the western district from the southeastern."—Halbert in Pub. Ala. Hist. Soc., Misc. Coll., 1, 375-376, 1901.

Hattack-falah-hosh.—Reed in Sturm's Statehood Mag., 1, 85, Nov. 1905. Oklafalaya.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1837), 698, 1837. Okla falaya.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Oklahannali ('six towns'). Originally given to 6 closely connected Choctaw towns on several tributaries of Chicasawhay r., in Smith and Jasper cos., Miss., this name finally came to be applied to one of the three principal divisions of the Choctaw which included, besides the "Sixtowns" proper, the districts of Chickasawhay, Yowani, Coosa, and perhaps some others, the names of which have become lost. The towns were also called "English towns" because they espoused the English cause in the Choctaw civil war of 1748-50. Adair (Hist. Inds., 298, 1775) mentions "seven towns that lie close together and next to New Orleans," possibly meaning these. The six towns were Bishkon, Chinakbi, Inkilis Tamaha, Nashwaiya, Okatalaya, and Talla. They spoke a peculiar dialect of Choctaw, and in the Choctaw Nation, where they removed in 1845, they are still known as Sixtown Indians. Although the name "Six Towns" was usually applied to this group, Oskelagna (q. v.) was also mentioned as one of them, which would make a seventh, thus agreeing with Adair's statement. The population in 1846 (Rutherford in Ind. Aff. Rep., 877, 1847) was 650. For the boundaries of this division, see Oklafalaya and Oypatoocooloo. (H. W. H.)

Bay Indians.—Rutherford in Ind. Aff. Rep., 877, 1847. English Towns.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., 1, 108, 1884. Oklahannali.—Wright in Ind. Aff. Oknagak. A Kuskwogniut Eskimo village and seat of a Roman Catholic mission on the n. bank of Kuskokwim r., Alaska. Pop. 130 in 1880, 36 in 1890.

Oh-hagamut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893. Okhogamuts.—Nelson (1879) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Oknagamut.—Baker, ibid. Oknagamuts.—Bruce, Alaska, map, 1885. Ookhogamuts.—Hallock in Nat. Geog. Mag., ix, 90, 1898.

Okomiut ('people of the lee side'). An Eskimo tribe dwelling on Cumberland sd., Baffin land. They embrace the Talirpingmiut, Kinguamiut, Kingnaitmiut, and Saumingmiut. When whalers first visited them, about 1850, the population amounted to 1,500, but it was reduced to 245 in 1883. Their villages and settlements are: Anarnitung, Aukardneling, Ekaluakdjuin, Ekaluin, Ekalukdjuak, Idjorituaktuin, Igpirto, Imigen, Kangertloaping, Kangertlung, Kangertlukdjuak, Karmang, Karsukan, Karusuit, Katernuna, Kekertaujang, Kekerten, Kimissing, Kingaseareang, Kingua, Kitingujang, Kordlubing, Koukdjuak, Naujateling, Nedlung, Niantilik, Nirdlirn, Niutang, Nuvujalung, Nuvujen, Pujetung, Sakiakdjung, Saunutung, Tikerakdjung, Tuakdjuak, Tupirbikdjuin, Ugjuktung, Ukiadliving, Umanaktuak, and Utikimiting.

Oqomiut.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 424, 1888. Oxomiut.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., no. 80, 69, 1885.

Okommakamesit. A village of praying Indians in 1674 near the present Marlborough, Mass. It was in the territory of the Nipmuc.

Okkokonimesit.—Gookin (1677) in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 435, 1836. Okommakamesit.—Gookin (1674) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., 1, 185, 1806. Okenhonesit.—Gookin (1677) in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 455, 1836.

Okopeya ('in danger'). A band of the Sisseton Sioux, an offshoot of the Tizaptan.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 217, 1897.

Okos ('band of bulls'). A former Arikara band under Kunuteshan, Chief Bear.

Bulls.—Culbertson in Smithsonian Rep. 1850, 143, 1851. O-kōs'.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol., 357, 1862.

Okossisak. An Eskimo village on Salmon r., w. Greenland.—Kane, Arctic Explor., ii, 124, 1856.

Okow. See Ocow.

Okowvinjha. A former Gabrieleño rancheria near San Fernando mission, Los Angeles co., Cal. (Taylor in Cal.

Farmer, May 11, 1860). Probably identical with Kowanga or with Cahuenga.

Okpaak. A Malecite village on middle St John r., N. B., in 1769.

Ocpack.—La Tour, map, 1784. Okpaak.—Wood (1769) quoted by Hawkins, Miss., 361, 1845. Ougpaak.—Jefferys, Fr. Doms., pt. 1, map, 119, 1761.

Okpam. A former Maidu village on the w. side of Feather r., just below the village of Sesum, Sutter co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pl. 38, 1905.

Oktahatke ('white sand'). A former Seminole town 7 m. N. E. of Sampala, probably in Calhoun co., Fla. Menohomahla was chief in 1823.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74, 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Oktchunualgi ('salt people'). An extinct Creek clan.

Ok-chün'-wä.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1878. Oktchünualgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 156, 1884.

Okuwa. The Cloud clans of the Tewa pueblos of San Juan, Santa Clara, San Ildefonso, Tesuque, and Nambe, N. Mex., and of Hano, Ariz.

Kus.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891 (Navaho name). O'-ku-wa.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., vii, 166, 1894 (Hano). Okuwa-táo.—Hodge in *Am. (Santa Clara form; q=Ger. ch). Owhát táo.—Ibid. (Tesuque form). Owhü táo.—Ibid. (Nambe form).

Okwanuchu (Ok-wa'-nu-chu). A small Shasta tribe formerly occupying the upper part of McCloud r., Cal., as far down as Salt cr., the upper Sacramento as far down as Squaw cr., and the valley of the latter stream. Their language is in part close to that of the Shasta proper, but it contains a number of totally distinct words, unlike any other surrounding language. (R. B. D.)

Ola (O'-la). A former village of the Maidu on Sacramento r., just above Knight's Landing, Sutter co., Cal. The name has also been applied to the inhabitants as a tribal division. If they were the same as the Olashes, who in 1856 lived near Hock farm, Sutter co., there were 20 survivors in 1856. (R. B. D.)

Olashes.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 9, 1860 (probably identical). Ol'-la.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 282, 1877.

Olabalkebiche (Ulabalkebish, 'Tattooed Serpent,' in French Serpent Piqué, usually but erroneously translated 'Stung Serpent'). A noted Natchez chief and the one oftenest referred to by French writers. He was not the Great Sun, or head-chief of the nation, but occupied the second position of dignity, that of head war-chief, and was so deeply loved by his superior that he was sometimes, as by Dumont's informant, supposed to have been the head-chief himself. He and the Great Sun are usually called brothers, and very likely they were, though it is possible they were brothers only in the Indian sense—i. e., as children of women belonging to one social group. The first that is heard of Olabalkebiche is in the Natchez war of 1716, when he with his brother and a number of other persons were seized by Bienville and held in captivity until they had agreed to make reparation for the murder of some traders and assist the French in erecting a fort near their villages. From this time until his death Olabalkebiche appears as the friend of the French and peacemaker between his own people and them. He was on intimate terms with all the French officers and the principal settlers, including the historian Le Page Du Pratz. At his death, in 1725, the grief of the Great Sun knew no bounds, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the French could restrain him from committing suicide. They could not, however, avert the destruction of his wives and officers who were killed to accompany his soul into the realm of spirits. Before this took place his body lay in state in his own house for some time surrounded by his friends, the insignia of his rank, and the marks of his prowess, including the calumets received by him, and 46 rings, to indicate the number of times he had counted coup against his enemies. Detailed descriptions of the mortuary ceremonies are given by Du Pratz and Dumont, though the latter, or rather his anonymous informant, is in error in speaking of him as the Great Sun. From all the accounts given of this chief it is evident that he was a man of unusual force of character combined with an equal amount of sagacity in the face of new conditions, such as were brought about by the settlement of the French in his neighborhood. Whether from policy or real regard he was one of the best friends the French possessed among the Natchez, and his death and that of his brother two years later paved the way for an ascendancy of the English party in the nation and the terrible massacre of 1729. (J. R. S.)

Olacnayake. A former Seminole village situated about the extreme N. E. corner of Hillsboro co., Fla.—H. R. Doc. 78, 25th Cong., 2d sess., map, 768, 1838.

Olagale. A "kingdom," i. e. tribe, mentioned by Fontaneda as being, about 1570, somewhere in N. central Florida, E. of Apalachee. By consonantic interchange it appears to be identical with Etocale (Biedma), Ocale (Ranjel), and Cale (Gentl. of Elvas), a "province" through which De Soto passed in 1539 on the road to Potano (q. v.), and is probably also the Eloqualé of the De Bry map of 1591, indicated as westward from middle St John r., perhaps in the neighborhood of the present Ocala, Marion co., Fla. Biedma speaks of it as a small town, probably confusing the tribe with one of its villages, but all the others speak of it as an independent province or kingdom. Ranjel names Uqueten as the first town of the province entered by the Spaniards coming from the s. (J. M.)

Olamentke. A name first applied by some of the earlier writers to a so-called division of the Moquelumnan family inhabiting the country immediately n. of the Golden Gate and San Francisco bay, in Marin, Sonoma, and Napa cos., Cal. The people of this region were among the later neophytes taken to Dolores mission at San Francisco, and among the first of those at San Rafael and San Francisco Solano missions, both of which were in their country. Very few of these so-called Olamentke now survive. See Moquelumnan. (S. A. B.)

Olanche. Supposed to be a Mono-Paviotso band of s. E. California, and evidently the people of Olancha, s. of Owens lake.

Olanchea.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Old Dogs. A society of the Hidatsa.—Culbertson in Smithsonian. Rep. 1850, 143, 1851.

Old King. See Sayenqueraghta.

Old Knife. A prominent chief of the Skidi Pawnee, known among his people as Latalesha ('Knife Chief'), first brought to public notice at St Louis when he signed, as Settulushaa, the treaty of June 18, and, as Letereshar, the treaty of June 22, 1818. Maj. S. H. Long met him at his camp on Loup fork of Platte r., Nebr., in 1819.

He was the father of Petalesharo (q. v.) and to him is attributed the cessation of the religious custom of burning prisoners. He also signed the treaty of Ft Atkinson, Council Bluffs, Ia., Sept. 30, 1825. An oil portrait, painted by John Neagle in 1821, is in possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Old Mad Town. A former village, probably of the Upper Creeks, on an upper branch of Cahawba r., near the present Birmingham, Ala.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ala. map, 1900.

Old Queen. See Magnus.

Old Shawnee Town. A village of the Shawnee, situated before 1770 on Ohio r. in Gallia co., Ohio, 3 m. above the mouth of the Great Kanawha.—Washington (1770) quoted by Rupp, West Penn., app., 401, 1846.

Old Sitka. A summer camp of the Sitka Indians on Baranof id., Alaska; pop. 73 in 1880.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Old Skin Necklace. A former Oglala Sioux band, under Minisa, or Red Water.—Culbertson in Smithsonian. Rep. 1850, 142, 1851.

Old Smoke. See Sayenqueraghta.

Oldtown. A village of the Penobscot on an island in Penobscot r., a few m. above Bangor, Me. It contained 410 inhabitants in 1898.

Olotaraca. A young chief who led the Indian force which accompanied De Gourgues in the destruction of the Spanish forts at the mouth of St John r., Fla., in 1568, and distinguished himself by being the first man to scale the breastwork, killing the gunner who had fired on the advancing French. He was the nephew of the chief of the Saturiba (Satourioua) tribe, which held lower St John r. and had welcomed the French under Ribaut in 1562 and Laudonnière in 1564. The name occurs also as Olotoraca, Olotacara, Otocara, etc., and according to Gatschet the proper form is Holo'taraca, hola'ta being the title for a subchief in the Timucua language. (J. M.)

Olowitok (O'-o'-wi-tok, from olowin, 'west'). A general name applied by the people of the Miwok (Moquelumnan) stock of California to all people living w. of the speaker. (S. A. B.)

Olompalis.—Choris, Voy. Pitt., 6, 1822. Olumpali.—Chamisso in Kotzebue, Voy., III, 51, 1821.

Omaha ('those going against the wind or current'). One of the 5 tribes of the so-called Dhegiha group of the Siouan family, the other 4 being the Kansa, Quapaw, Osage, and Ponca. Hale and Dorsey concluded from a study of the languages and traditions that, in the westward migration of the Dhegiha from their seat on Ohio and Wabash rs. after the separation, at least as early as 1500, of the Quapaw, who went down the Mississippi from the mouth of the Ohio, the Omaha branch moved up the great river, remaining awhile near the mouth of the Missouri while war and hunting parties explored the country to the n. w. The Osage remained on Osage r. and the Kansa continued up the Missouri, while the Omaha, still including the Ponca, crossed the latter stream and remained for a period in Iowa, ranging as far as the Pipestone quarry at the present Pipestone, Minn. They were driven back by the Dakota, and after the separation of the Ponca, who advanced into the Black hills, which occurred probably about 1650 at the mouth of Niobrara r., the Omaha settled on Bow cr., Nebr., and may have already been there at the date of Marquette's map (1673). Jefferys (1761) located the Omaha on the e. side of Missouri r., beyond the Iowa, immediately above Big Sioux r. In 1766 they appear to have had friendly relations with the Dakota, as Carver mentions having met both tribes together on Minnesota r. They were at their favorite resort near Omadi, Dakota co., Nebr., in 1800. Lewis and Clark (1804) found them on the s. side of Missouri r. opposite Sioux City, S. Dak., but learned that the tribe in 1802, while living at a point farther up the Missouri, was visited by smallpox, which had greatly reduced their number and caused their removal. Then, as in later years, they were at constant war with the Sioux. They were on the w. side of the Missouri a short distance above the Platte in 1845, but in 1855 removed to what is now Dakota co., Nebr. They joined with other tribes in the treaties of July 15, 1830, and Oct. 15, 1836, and by the treaty of Washington, D. C., Mar. 16, 1854, ceded all their lands w. of the Missouri and s. of a line running due w. from the point where Iowa r. leaves the bluffs, retaining their lands s. of this line for a reservation. By treaty of Mar. 6, 1865, they sold part of their reservation to the United States for the use of the Winnebago. Many of them learned to cultivate grain and raise stock, and in 1882, through the effort of Miss Alice C. Fletcher, a law was enacted granting lands in severalty and prospective citizenship.

OMAHA MAN.

The primitive dwellings of the Omaha were chiefly lodges of earth, more rarely of bark or mats, and skin tents. The earth lodges, similar in construction to those of the Mandan, were intended principally for summer use, when the people were not hunting. The bark lodges were usually elliptical in form, occasionally having two fireplaces and two smoke holes. The skin tent was used when the people were traveling or hunting the buffalo. Pottery was made by the Omaha before 1850, but the art has been forgotten. Their mortars were made by burning a hollow in a knot or round piece of wood, and spoons were made of horn, wood, and pottery. Polygamy was practised, but the maximum number of wives that any one man could have was three. Until 1880 there were two principal chiefs, usually selected from the Hangashenu subtribe, though there was no law or rule forbidding their selection from other divisions. In addition to these there were subordinate chiefs. Their religion, according to Dorsey (3rd Rep. B. A. E., 1884), was associated with the practice of medicine, mythology, and war customs, and with their gentile system.

The population of the Omaha since their recovery from the great loss by smallpox in 1802, when they were reduced to about 300, has greatly increased. In 1804, according to Lewis (Statist. View, 16, 1807), they numbered 600, including 150 warriors. In 1829 they were estimated at 1,900, and in 1843 at 1,600, both of which estimates were probably excessive. Schoolcraft gives 1,349 in 1851, Burrows 1,200 in 1857, and the same number is given by the census of 1880. In 1906 the population of the tribe was 1,228.

The Omaha gentes as given by Dorsey (15th Rep. B. A. E., 226, 1897) are: A.—Hangashenu half tribe: 1, Wezhinshte; 2, Omaxtux. A former Chumashan village near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Omegeese (Migtzi, 'bald eagle'). A gens of the Chippewa. See Migichihiliniou.

Me-giz-ze.—Tanner, Narr., 314, 1830. Me-gizze.—Warren in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 44, 1885. Mi'-gisi.—Gatschet, Ojibwa MS., B. A. E., 1882. Migtzi.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1907 (correct form). O-me-gee-ze.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 166, 1877.

Omenaosse. A village or tribe mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as being between Matagorda bay and Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas. The name was given him by the Ebahamo Indians who lived in that region and who were probably Karankawan. See Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., I, 35, 46, 1891.

Omeaoffe.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 137, 1846 (misprint). Omeaosse.—Ibid., 152. Omeaotes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723. Omenaossé.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 288, 1878.

Omik. A former Aleut village on Agattu id., Alaska, one of the Near id. group of the Aleutians, now uninhabited.

Omisiss (O'ml'sis, 'eaters'; sing., O'ml'sists). A principal division of the Cheyenne. The name is frequently used as synonymous with Northern Cheyenne, because the dominant division in the N. Before the division of the Cheyenne the Omisiss occupied that portion of the camp circle immediately N. of the E. entrance. (J. M.)

Eaters.—Dorsey in Field Columb. Mus. Pub. 103, 62, 1905. Hmi'sis.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1026, 1896. mi'sis.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Val., 290, 1862. Omissis.—Grinnell, Social Org. Cheyennes, 136, 1905.

Omitiaqua. A village ("king") in Florida subject to Utina, chief of the Timucua in 1564, according to Laudonnière. The De Bry map places it E. of lower St John r. Omitaqua.—De Bry, map (1591) in Le Moyne, Narr., Appleton trans., 1875. Omitiaqua.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 243, 1869.

Ommunise (O'münise, 'he gathers firewood.'—W. J.). A Chippewa or Ottawa band formerly living on Carp r., Mich.; also a place between Lake of the Woods and Winnipeg, so called because of the scarcity of wood.

Carp River band.—Smith in Ind. Aff. Rep., 53, 1851. Omanise.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905 (correct form). Ommunise.—Smith, op. cit.

Omowuh. The Rain-cloud clan of the Patki (Water-house) phratry of the Hopi. Omá-a.—Bourke, Snake Dance, 117, 1884. O'-mau.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. Ompivromo. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Ona. The third village of the Chilula on Redwood cr., Cal.

Oh-nah.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853 (Yurok name). Ono.—Ibid. Unuh.—Powers in Overland Mo., VII, 530, 1872.

Onackatin. See Onockatin.

Onagatano. A former province N. of Florida peninsula, in snow-clad mountains, where, in the 16th century, it was said the Apalachee obtained their gold. Distinct from Olagatano, q. v. (Fontaneda Mem., ca. 1575, Smith trans., 20, 1854).

Onaghee. An ancient Seneca settlement on the S. side of Fall brook, at Hopewell, Ontario co., N. Y. Before 1720 a number of the inhabitants settled near Montreal, and in 1750 the place had been long deserted.

Onachee.—Cammerhoff (1750) quoted by Conover, Kan. and Geneva MS. Onaghee.—Schuyler (1720) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 543, 1855. Onahe.—Doc. of 1719, ibid., 528. Onahee.—Doc. of 1726, ibid., 797. Onahie.—Evans, Map, 1755. Onnahee.—Cammerhoff quoted by Conover, op. cit. Onnahee.—Conover, ibid. Onnahee.—Riggs (1720) in N. Onaheli. One of five hamlets composing the former Choctaw town of Imongalasha in Neshoba co., Miss.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 432, 1902.

Onancock. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, about the site of the present Onancock, in Accomack co., Va. Four or five families were still there in 1722.

Onancock.—Beverley, Va., 199, 1722. Onancock.—Bozman, Md., i, 149, 1837. Onancoke.—Ibid., 148. Onankok.—Herrman (1670), Map to accompany Rep. on the Line between Va. and Md., 1873. Onaucoke.—Pory in Smith (1629), Va., ii, 61, repr. 1819.

Onapiem. A village or tribe mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as being n. or n. w. of Maligne (Colorado) r., Tex. The region was occupied and controlled largely by Caddoan tribes, and the name seems to have been given to Joutel by Ebahamo Indians, who were probably Karankawan. See Gatschet, Karankawa Indians, 35, 1891. (A. C. F.)

Onapiem.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., iii, 289, 1878. Onapien.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 137, 1846. Onapienes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723.

Onasakenrat ('White Feather'), Joseph. A Mohawk chief, noted for his translations of religious works into his native language. He was born on his father's farm, near Oka, Canada, Sept. 4, 1845; at 14 years of age he was sent to Montreal College to be educated for the priesthood, remaining there about 4 years. He was afterward converted to Protestantism and became an evangelical preacher. On June 15, 1877, the Catholic church of Oka was burned, and Chief Joseph was tried for the offense, but was not convicted. He died suddenly, Feb. 8, 1881, at Caughnawaga. Among his translations into the Mohawk dialect are the Gospels (1880) and a volume of hymns. At the time of his death he was engaged in translating the remainder of the Bible, having reached in the work the Epistles to the Hebrews.

Onathaqua (possibly intended for Ouathaqua). A tribe or village about C. Cañaveral, E. coast of Florida, in constant alliance with the Calusa (q. v.) in 1564 (Laudonnière). Probably identical in whole or in part with the Ais tribe. Not to be confounded with Onatheaqua, q. v. (J. M.)

Oathkaqua.—De Bry map (1591) in Le Moyne, Narr., Appleton trans., 1875. Onathaqua.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 282, 1869 (possibly for Ouathaqua). Onothaca.—Brackenridge, La., 84, 1814. Othaqua.—De l'Isle, map, 1700.

Onatheaqua. A principal tribe in 1564, described as living near the high mountains, apparently in upper Georgia, and equal in power and importance to the Timucua, Potano, Yustaga, and Saturiba, according to Laudonnière. Not to be confounded with Onathaqua (q. v.), near C. Cañaveral, Fla. (J. M.)

Onatheaqua.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 244, 1869; De Bry, map (1591) in Le Moyne, Narr., Appleton trans., 1875 (indicated w. of St John r. and beyond Oustaca=Yustaga).

Onava. A former Nevome pueblo and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1622; situated in lat. 28° 40', lon. 109°, on the Rio Yaqui, Sonora, Mexico. Pop. 875 in 1678, 457 in 1730. The inhabitants probably spoke a dialect slightly different from the Nevome proper. The town is now completely Mexicanized.

Hare-eaters.—ten Kate in Jour. Am. Eth. and Arch., 142, 1892 (Tchoofkwatam, or: Pima name). Ohavas.—Escudero quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 101, 1884. Onabas.—Kino map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726. Onava.—Balbi (1826) quoted by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 352, 1864. San Ignacio Onabas.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., iii, 359, 1857. Tchoofkwatam.—ten Kate, op. cit. ('hare-eaters'; Pima name).

Onaweron (prob. '[there] are springs of water'). A traditional Iroquois town of the Bear clan; so enumerated in the list of towns in the Chant of Welcome of the Condolence Council of the League of the Iroquois. Nothing definite is known of its situation or of the particular tribe to which it belonged. See Hale, Iroq. Book of Rites, 120, 1883. (J. N. B. H.)

Onawmanient. A tribe of the Powhatan confederacy on the s. bank of the Potomac in the present Westmoreland co., Va., numbering about 400 in 1608. Their principal village, of the same name, was probably on Nominy bay.

Anawmanient.—Bozman, Md., i, 138, 1837. Nominies.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 4, 9, 1848. Onaumanient.—Smith (1612), Works, Arber ed., 52, 1884 (the village).

Onbi. A Costanoan village situated in 1815 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Onchomo (Ontcomo). A former Maidu village at Mud Springs, about 5 m. due s. of Placerville, Eldorado co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pl. 38, 1905.

Ondachoe. A Cayuga village mentioned by Cammerhoff, the Moravian, in 1750, as situated on the w. shore of Cayuga lake, N. Y., apparently opposite Aurora. He said it was larger than Cayuga. Gen. Clark placed it at Sheldrake point, but this is too far s. (W. M. B.)

Ondatra. A name for the muskrat (Fiber zibethicus), derived from one of the Huron dialects of the Iroquoian language early current in the Hochelaga region of Canada. A more common name is musquash, of Algonquian origin. (A. F. C.)

tagnais, living in 1644 about 100 leagues above "Saguené," Quebec.

Ondoutaouaherouan —Jes. Rel. 1644, 99, 1858. Ondoutaouaka.—Ibid., 1642, 10, 1858.

Onechsagerat. The "old chief" of Cayuga, mentioned by Cammerhoff in 1750. He was also styled Teiyughsaragarat, the principal chief, when he received Sir Wm. Johnson's belts and went to Canada in 1756. Weiser called him Oyeaghsaragarat in 1754, and Oyuchseragarat in 1752. His name appears in 1762 and 1774, the latter year at Onondaga, in November, when "a Cayuga chief named Oyeaghsaragarat spoke." This may possibly have been a younger man. (W. M. B.)

Oneida (Anglicized compressed form of the common Iroquois term tiionēn'iote, 'there it it-rock has-set-up (continuative),' i. e. a rock that something set up and is still standing, referring to a large sienite boulder near the site of one of their ancient villages). A tribe of the Iroquois confederation, formerly occupying the country s. of Oneida lake, Oneida co., N. Y., and latterly including the upper waters of the Susquehanna. According to authentic tradition, the Oneida was the second tribe to accept the proposition of Dekanawida and Hiawatha to form a defensive and offensive league of all the tribes of men for the promotion of mutual welfare and security. In the federal council and in other federal assemblies they have the right to representation by 9 federal chieftains of the highest rank. Like the Mohawk, the Oneida have only 3 clans, the Turtle, the Wolf, and the Bear, each clan being represented by 3 of the 9 federal representatives of this tribe (see Clan and Gens). Insofar as eldership as a member of a clan phratry can give precedence in roll-call and the right to discuss first in order all matters coming before its side of the council fire, the Oneida are the dominant tribe within the tribal phratry, called the Four (originally Two) Brothers and "Offspring," to which they belong. In tribal assemblies the Turtle and the Wolf constitute a clan phratry, and the Bear another. The Oneida have usually been a conservative people in their dealing with their allies and with other peoples. In 1635 they, with the Onondaga, Cayuga, and Mohawk, sought to become parties to the peace concluded in the preceding year between the Seneca and the Hurons. At this period they were called sedentary and very populous, but only from Indian reports.

The Jesuit Relation for 1646 (p. 3, 1858) says that with the exception of the Mohawk there was no treaty, properly speaking, then in existence between the Iroquois tribes inclusive of the Oneida and the French. From the same Relation it is learned that "Onnieoute" (Oneniote), the principal Oneida village of that time, having lost the greater portion of its men in a war with the "upper Algonquin," was compelled to request the Mohawk to lend aid in repeopling the village by granting thereto a colony of men, and that it was for this reason that the Mohawk ceremonially and publicly call the Oneida their daughter or son. This story is probably due to a misconception of the fictitious political kinships and relationships established between the several tribes at the time of the institution and organization of the League (see Confederation). The Cayuga and the Tuscarora are likewise called "Offspring," but not for the reason above given. The Jesuit Relation for 1648 (p. 46) first definitely locates the Oneida. From the Relation for 1641 (p. 74) it is gathered that the Jesuit fathers had learned that the Oneida had a peculiar form of government in which the rulership alternated between the two sexes. This statement is likewise apparently due to a misconception of the fact that among Iroquois tribes the titles to the chiefships belonged to the women of certain clans in the tribe and not to the men, although men were chosen by the women to exercise the rights and privileges and to perform the duties pertaining to these chiefships, and that there were, and indeed still are, a number of women filling federal chiefships bearing the name of the highest class. These women chieftains have approximately the same rights, privileges, and immunities as the men chiefs, but exercise them fully only in emergencies; they, too, maintain the institutions of society and government among the women.

The Jesuit Relation for 1667 (LII, 145, 1899) declares that the Oneida were at that time the least tractable of the Iroquois tribes. It was at this period that Father Bruyas was stationed at the mission of St François Xavier among the Oneida. It is also learned from this source that the Mohegan and the Conestoga menaced the Oneida. While on this mission Father Bruyas suffered for food for a part of the year and was compelled to sustain life on a diet of dried frogs. By the end of the year 1669 he had baptized 30 persons. In 1660 the Oneida with the Mohawk were the least populous of the Iroquois tribes. The Jesuit Relation for 1669-70 speaks of the Oneida being present at a "feast of the dead" held at the Mohawk village of Caughnawaga, showing that in a modified form at least the decennial ceremony of the so-called "Dead Feast" was practised among the Iroquois when first known. On Jan. 30, 1671, the Oneida began the torture of a captive Conestoga woman, and the torture was prolonged through 2 days and 2 nights because he in whose stead she had been given was burned at Conestoga for that length of time. It is held by some that the town defended by four lines of palisades closely fastened together and attacked by Champlain in 1615 with his Huron and Algonquian allies, was an Oneida village, although other authorities place it elsewhere, in Onondaga territory. In fact, the wars of the Oneida were those of the League, although like the other tribes they seem to have put forth most energy against the tribes who in some manner had given them the greatest offense. The Catawba and the Muskhogean tribes, as well as the Susquehanna r. Indians, the Conestoga, gave most occupation to the Oneida warriors.

After the conquest of the tribes on the Susquehanna and its tributaries and those on the Potomac, chiefly by the warriors of the Oneida, the Cayuga, and the Seneca, and those tribes which had submitted to Iroquois rule, a question arose as to the propriety of the Mohawk, who had not given any aid in subduing these peoples, sharing in the income arising from land sales there. Hence for a time the Mohawk received no emolument from this source, until the Iroquois tribes became divided and the Mohawk sold the lands in the Wyoming Valley region of Pennsylvania to the Susquehanna Land Co. of Connecticut. This, then, in 1728, moved the great federal council of the league at Onondaga to send Shikellamy, an Oneida chief, as a superintendent, to the forks of the Susquehanna for the purpose of watching over the affairs and the interests of the Six Nations of Iroquois in Pennsylvania. At first Shikellamy exercised a general supervision over only the Shawnee and the Delawares, who thereafter were required to consult him in all matters arising between them and the proprietary government. So well did he perform his duty that in 1745 Shikellamy was made full superintendent over all the dependent tribes on the Susquehanna, with his residence at Shamokin. He showed great astuteness in the management of the affairs intrusted to his care, seeking at all times to promote the interests of his people. Such was the influence which the Oneida exercised on the Susquehanna.

In 1687 the Oneida were included in the warrant of the King of Great Britain to Gov. Dongan of New York, authorizing him to protect the Five Nations as subjects of Great Britain. In 1696 Count Frontenac burned the Oneida castle, destroyed all their corn, and made prisoners of 30 men, women, and children.

In 1645-46 the Oneida were at war with the Nipissing, and one band of 17 warriors from "Ononniote" defeated an Algonkin party under Teswehat, the one-eyed chief of this people, killing the chief's son and taking 2 women prisoners. This Iroquois party was afterward defeated by 30 Hurons and the 2 women were recaptured.

In the Jesuit Relation for 1666-68 Father Bruyas writes that the Oneida were reputed the most cruel of all the Iroquois tribes; that they had always made war on the Algonkin and the Hurons, and that two-thirds of the population of their villages were composed of the people of these two tribes who had become Iroquois in temper and inclination. This missionary adds that the nature of the Oneida was then altogether barbarous, being cruel, sly, cunning, and prone to bloodshed and carnage.

In 1655 a party of 60 Oneida warriors was sent against the Amikwa, or Beaver Indians. This war was still in progress in 1661, for in that year 2 bands, one of 24 and the other of 30 warriors, were encountered on their way to fight the Amikwa.

Chauchetière (letter in Jesuit Relations, Thwaites ed., LXII, 185, 1900) says that "war is blazing in the country of the Outaouaks," that the Iroquois, especially the Oneida, continued their hatred of the Outagami (Foxes) and the Illinois, and so have slain and captured many Illinois. In 1681 they killed or captured about 1,000 of these unfortunate people.

In 1711, about half of the Tuscarora tribe, then dwelling in North Carolina, seems to have conspired with several alien neighboring tribes and bands to destroy the Carolina settlers. The colonists, however, recollecting the ancient feud between the Southern and the Northern Indians, allied themselves with the Catawba and some Muskhogean tribes. The Tuscarora, sustaining several severe defeats, were finally driven from their homes and hunting grounds. This act of the Southern Indians made the hatred of the Iroquois against the Catawba more bitter and merciless.

The Oneida were at times friendly to the French and to the Jesuit missionaries, while the other Iroquois were their determined enemies. A great part of the Oneida and the Tuscarora, through the influence of Rev. Samuel Kirkland, remained neutral in the Revolutionary war, while the majority of the confederation of the Iroquois were divided and did not act as a unit in this matter. Early in that struggle the hostile Iroquois tribes attacked the Oneida and burned one of their villages, forcing them to take refuge near the Americans in the vicinity of Schenectady, where they remained until the close of the war. Shortly after the main body of the tribe returned to their former homes. At a later period a considerable number emigrated to Canada and settled on Grand r. and Thames r., Ontario. Another small band, called Oriskas, formed a new settlement at Ganowarohare, a few miles from the main body in Oneida co., N. Y. At different earlier periods the Oneida adopted and gave lands to the Tuscarora, the Stockbridges, and the Brothertons. The Tuscarora afterward removed to land granted by the Seneca in w. New York. In 1846, having sold most of their lands in New York, the greater part of the Oneida, together with their last two adopted tribes, removed to a tract on Green bay, Wis., where they now reside. Among those living in New York at the time of removal were two parties known respectively as the First Christian, and the Second Christian or Orchard party.

The Oneida entered into treaties with the United States at Ft Stanwix, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1784; Ft Harmar, O., Jan. 9, 1789; Canandaigua, N. Y., Nov. 11, 1794; Oneida, N. Y., Dec. 2, 1794; Buffalo Creek, N. Y., Jan. 15, 1838; and Washington, D. C., Feb. 3, 1838. They also held no fewer than 30 treaties with the State of New York between the years 1788 and 1842.

The estimates of Oneida population at different periods are no more satisfactory than those relating to the other Iroquois tribes. The earliest account (1660) gives them 500. They are placed at 1,000 in 1677 and 1721. In 1770 they were estimated at 410, in 1776 at 628, and in 1795 at 660, and were said to have been decreasing for a long time. They number at present (1906) about 3,220, of whom 286 are still in New York, 2,151 under the Oneida School Superintendency in Wisconsin, 783 on Thames r., Ontario, besides those settled among the other Iroquois on Grand r., Ontario. There are no means of learning the number of Oneida who joined the several colonies of Catholic Iroquois.

The Oneida towns, so far as known, were: Awegen, Brothertown, Cahunghage, Canowdowsa, Cowassalon, Chittenango, Ganadoga, Hostayuntwa, Oneida, Opolopong, Oriska, Ossewingo, Ostogeron, Schoherage, Sevege, Solocka, Stockbridge, Tegasoke, Teseroken, Teiosweken, and Tkanetota. (J. N. B. H.)

Oneida. One of the chief and first known villages of the Oneida people, and which within historical times has been removed to several new situations. It seems to have been originally a town of the Wolf clan, for it is so enumerated in the Chant of Welcome of the Condolence Council of the League of the Iroquois; the Wolf clan constituted one of the two phratries in the tribal council of the Oneida. Arent Van Curler, who visited this town in 1634, wrote that it was situated on a high hill and defended by two rows of palisades; in the ramparts were two gates, one on the w. side, over which were standing "3 wooden images, of cut (carved?) wood, like men," adorned with 3 scalps, and the other, on the e. side, adorned with only one scalp; the western gate was 3½ ft wide, while the other was only 2 ft. He wrote that this palisade was 767 paces in circumference, and that within it were 66 lodges, "much better, higher, and more finished than all those others we saw." Those seen by Van Curler and his companions were the Mohawk castles. Of the first Mohawk castle Van Curler wrote: "There stood but 36 houses, in rows like streets, so that we could pass nicely. The houses are made and covered with bark of trees, and mostly flat at the top. Some are 100, 90, or 80 paces long, and 22 or 23 ft high. . . . The houses were full of corn that they lay in store, and we saw maize; yes, in some houses more than 300 bushels." His description of the third Mohawk castle, then called Sohanidisee, or Rehanadisee, follows: "On a very high hill stood 32 lodges, like the other ones. Some were 100, 90, or 80 paces long; in every lodge we saw 4, 5, or 6 fireplaces where cooking went on." Some of the lodges were finished with wooden fronts, painted with all sorts of beasts, and in some of them were found very good axes, French shirts, coats, and razors, and lodges were seen where "60, 70 and more dried salmon were hanging." While in the Oneida castle Van Curler witnessed the conclusion of a temporary peace compact between the Oneida and the French Indians for purposes of trade for four years. To this he gave the name "Castle Enneyuttehage, or Sinnekens." The Oneida, the Onondaga, and the Cayuga were named respectively Onneyatte, Onondaga, and Koyockure (for Koyockwe), which indicates that the tribal divisions of the Iroquois were well known to the narrator at this period. This town was probably on one of the early Oneida village sites in the upper valley of Oneida cr., not far from Oriskany cr., and according to Van Curler's estimate, 75 or 80 m. w. of the Mohawk castle of Tenotoge (Tionontogen?); it was situated on the e. side of Oneida cr., and Van Curler saw n. w. of it, on the left bank of the creek, "tremendously high land that seemed to lie in the clouds." Just before reaching the castle he saw three graves, "just like our graves in length and height; usually their graves are round." These graves were surrounded with palisades, nicely closed up, and painted red, white, and black. The grave of a chief had an entrance, and at the top there was "a big wooden bird, and all around were painted dogs, and deer, and snakes, and other beasts." Such was the chief Oneida town of 1634. While with the Oneida Van Curler witnessed apparently a part of the New Year ceremonies of the Iroquois, which he regarded as so much "foolery."

According to Greenhalgh, who visited the Oneida in 1677, they had only one town, "newly settled, double stock-adoed," containing about 100 houses and 200 warriors, situated 20 (sic) m. from Oneida cr. and 30 m. s. of Mohawk r.; it had but little cleared land, "so that they are forced to send to ye Onondago's to buy corne." This village, therefore, was not situated on the site visited by Van Curler. In Aug. 1696 a principal town of the Oneida was burned by Vaudreuil, a lieutenant of Count Frontenac.

In 1756 Sir William Johnson (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 101, 1856) employed the name Onawaraghare to designate a place regarded as suitable for the erection of a fort, thus showing that at that time there was a village called "Canowaroghere." In 1762 Lieut. Guy Johnson, starting from German Flats, visited the Oneida (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 512, 1856). The first town reached he called "Upper Oneida Castle," and also simply "Oneida." Thence he went to "Canowaroghere, a new village of the Oneidas." On Sauthier's map of Jan. 1, 1779, 3 Oneida villages are placed in the valley of Oneida cr.: (1) Old Oneyda Cast(le), placed e. of the headwaters of Oneida cr. and n. of the junction of the trails from Ft Schuyler and from Ft Herkmer; (2) Canowaroghare, lower down the valley at the junction of the trails from Ft Schuyler and Ft Stanwix, and on the left bank of Oneida cr.; (3) New Oneyda Castle, on the right bank of Oneida cr., at the junction of the trails from his Canowaroghare and from Ft Stanwix, and on the trail leading from Canowaroghare to the Royal Blockhouse on Wood cr. Two of these, if not all of them, were contemporary. In 1774 the Montauk Indians were to be settled at Canowaroghare. At Oneida in 1667 was founded the mission of Saint François Xavier.

In a note attached to the original of a Paris document of 1757 (N. Y. Doc. Hist., i, 526, 1849) the "great Oneida village" is said to be "two leagues from the Lake," and that within it the English had constructed a "picket Fort with four bastions," which however had been destroyed by the Oneida in pursuance of a promise made by them to the Marquis de Vaudreuil. This note adds that a second Oneida village, called "the little village," was situated "on the bank of the Lake."

It is thus seen that the site and the name have shifted from place to place, but were restricted to the valleys of Oneida cr. and upper Oriskany cr. The name Canowaroghare is the modern name of the city of Oneida and of the Indian settlement situated about 2 m. s., in Madison co., N. Y. In 1666-68 (Jes. Rel., Thwaites ed., li, 121, 1899) Father Bruyas wrote that "Onneiout" was situated on an eminence whence a great portion of the surrounding country could be seen, were the environing forest cut away; that "there is no river or lake, except at 5 leagues distant from the town;" that more than half the population was composed of "Algonquins and Hurons," and that the Oneida had never spoken of peace until within two years. The Oneida have settlements in Canada and in Wisconsin at Green Bay, but these are not towns. (J. N. B. H.)

Oneidas of the Thames. A body of Oneida, numbering 783 in 1906, residing on a reservation of 5,271 acres on Thames r., in Delaware tp., Middlesex co., near Strathroy, Ontario. Their principal occupation is day labor, and a few of them are good farmers. They are industrious and law-abiding, and while some of them are progressing well, on the whole their progress is slow.

Oneka. A Mohegan chief of Connecticut, eldest son and successor of the celebrated Uncas; born about 1640, died 1710. In 1659, under the name Owaneco, he joined with his father and his brother, Attawenhood, in deeding a tract 9 m. square for the settlement of the town of Norwich, Oneka signing with the totem of a bird. In 1661 he made an attack, with 70 men, on one of Massasoit's villages, killing 3 persons and taking 6 prisoners. In 1675, at the instance of Uncas, he went to Boston, with two brothers and 50 warriors, to offer their services to the English against the Wampanoag under King Philip, which were accepted, and shortly after his party almost captured this noted leader. In 1679 Uncas and Oneka made a grant of 600 acres to the county for rebuilding the jail, and two years later the General Court gave its consent that Uncas should deed his lands to Oneka. The latter had a son named Mahomet, or Mawhomott.

Onekagoncka. A former Mohawk town, situated on the left bank of Mohawk r., at its confluence with Schoharie r., near the site of the present Fort Hunter, Montgomery co., N. Y. It was visited in 1634 by Arent Van Curler (Corlaer), who referred to it as the first castle, built on a high hill and consisting of "36 houses, in rows like streets. . . The houses were made and covered with bark of trees, and mostly are flat at the top. Some are 100, 90, or 80 paces long and 22 and 23 ft. high. . . The houses were full of corn that they lay in store, and we saw maize; yes, in some of the houses more than 300 bushels. . . We lived a quarter of a mile from the fort in a small house, because a good many savages in the castle died of smallpox." Speaking of Adriochten, the principal chief of the Onkagoncka castle, Van Curler adds: "The chief showed me his idol; it was a head, with the teeth sticking out; it was dressed in red cloth. Others have a snake, a turtle, a swan, a crane, a pigeon, or the like for their idols, to tell the fortune; they think they will always have luck in doing so." (J. N. B. H.)

Oneniote ('projecting stone.'—Hewitt). A former Cayuga village, on the site of the present Oneida, on Cayuga lake, N. Y. It became greatly reduced in the war with the Hurons in the middle of the 17th century, and resorted to a common Iroquois expedient in perpetuating its people by sending to the Mohawk, their neighbors, "for some men to be married to the girls and women who had remained without husbands, in order that the nation should not perish. This is why the Iroquois (Mohawk) name this village their child." (W. M. B.)

Onneiôté.—Jes. Rel. 1653, 18, 1858. Onneiout.—Ibid. Onneiôte.—Jes. Rel. 1646, 4, 1858. Ononioté.—Jes. Rel. 1646, 51, 1858. Ononioté.—Jes. Rel. 1647, 9, 1858. Ononjete.—Jes. Rel. 1645, 32, 1858. Ononjoté.—Ibid., 33.

Onentisati. A Huron village in Tiny township, Ontario, first mentioned in 1635. (W. M. B.)

Onentisati.—Jes. Rel. 1635, 39, 1858. Onnentissati.—Ibid.

Onepowesepewenenewak (Onipowisibiwininiwag, 'people of death river'). A former Chippewa band in Minnesota. Cf. Nibowisibirininiwak.

Onépówé Sépé Wenewenewak.—Long, Exped. St. Peter's R., II, 153, 1824. Onipowisibiwininiwag.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905 (correct form).

Oneronon. An unidentified tribe living s. of St Lawrence r. in 1640.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 35, 1858.

Onextaco. A former rancheria, presumably Costanoan, connected with San Juan Bautista mission, Cal.—Bancroft, Hist. Cal., I, 557, note, 1886.

Oneyana. Alias Beech Tree. An Oneida chief at the treaty of 1788, and called Peter Oneyana at the treaty of 1785. In 1792

Beech Tree was the principal chief and quite influential, witnessing the Cayuga treaty of 1789 and the Onondaga treaty of 1790, and signing the letters of 1786 and 1787. As Onyanta, or Beech Tree, he signed Col. Harper's deed. He probably died before 1795. (W. M. B.)

Ongniaahra ('bisected bottomland'). A village of the Neutrals, situated in 1626–50 on Niagara r., one day's journey from the Seneca. This is the French spelling of the ancient Huron pronunciation of the name, which, written by English writers from Iroquois utterance, has become "Niagara." (J. N. B. H.)

Ongmarahronon.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 35, 1858 (m misprint for ni; name of the people). Onguiaahra.—Jes. Rel. 1641, 75, 1858 (ui misprint for ni). Ouaroronon.—De la Roche Dallion in Sagard, Hist. du Canada, III, 804, 1866 (u misprint for n, and second o for a).

Ongovehenok. A Nuwukmiut Eskimo settlement near Pt Barrow, Alaska.—11th Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Onia. A former village of the Papago, probably in Pima co., Ariz., containing 8 families in 1865.—Davidson in Ind. Aff. Rep., 135, 1865.

Onismah. A settlement in Port San Juan, s. w. coast of Vancouver id., Brit. Col., probably inhabited by the Pacheenah.—Brit. and U. S. Survey Map, 1882.

Onixaymas. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with San Juan Bautista mission, Cal.

Onextaco.—Engelhardt, Franc. in Cal., 398, 1897. Onixaymas.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 23, 1860.

Onkot (On'-kot). A former Chumashan village in Ventura co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Onktokadan. A tribe, not identified, said to have been exterminated by the Foxes. According to Sioux tradition they lived on the St Croix r. in Wisconsin and Minnesota (Neill, Minn., 144, 1858).

Onkwe Iyede ('a human being one is standing'). A traditional Iroquois town of the Tortoise clan; so enumerated in the list of towns in the Chant of Welcome of the Condolence Council of the League of the Iroquois. Nothing is known definitely as to its situation. See Hale, Iroq. Book of Rites, 118, 1883. (J. N. B. H.)

Onnahee. A former Seneca town, placed by Conover (Seneca Villages, 3, 1889) on the E. side of Fall brook, in the w. part of lot 20, town of Hopewell, Ontario co., N. Y. In 1719 this was one of the "furthest castles of the Cenecas," i. e. farthest westward. (J. N. B. H.)

Onaghee.—Schuyler and Livingston (1719) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 542, 1855. Onahe.—Doc. of 1719, ibid., 528. Onnachee.—Cammerhoff quoted by Conover, Seneca Villages, 3, 1889.

Onnightsiesanairone. One of the 6 "castles" of the Denighcariages (Amikwa) near Michilimackinac, Mich., in 1723.—Albany Conf. (1723) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 693, 1855.

Onnontare (Mohawk: 'it mountain is present.'—Hewitt). A Cayuga town in 1670 (Jes. Rel. 1670, 63, 1858). From remains found there it seems to have been a of Seneca r., and at Bluff point, near Fox Ridge, Cayuga co., N. Y. It may have derived its name from the moderate elevation above the marsh, or from Fort hill, which is plainly in sight. In 1670 it was the seat of the mission of Saint René and adjoined the marshes by whose name the river was often known. (W. M. B.)
Onnontare.—Jes. Rel. 1670, 63, 1858. Saint René.—Ibid. (mission name).

Onnontioga ('people of Onontio,' i. e. French Indians, Montreal Indians, Quebec Indians). A people, conquered by the Iroquois, living in 1670 among the Seneca in the village of Kanagaro, which was made up almost entirely of incorporated remnants of the conquered Onnontioga, Hurons, and Neutrals. Gen. J. S. Clark placed them at Waverly, N. Y., at or near Spanish hill, and this seems probable. (J. N. B. H.)

Onnontioga.—Jes. Rel. 1670, 69, 1858. Onnon-Tiogas.—Shea in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iv, 208, 1854. Onentiogas.—Conover, Kanadesaga and Geneva MS., B. A. E.

Onoalagona ('big head.'—Hewitt). A Mohawk village, about 1620, on the site of Schenectady, Schenectady co., N. Y. A band, taking its name from the village, occupied the immediate vicinity in more modern times. It is said by Macauley, with little foundation in fact, that the village was built on the site of a still older one, which had been the principal village of the tribe and was called Connoharriegoharrie (Kanoⁿ'waro'hā're?'). (J. M.)

Con-no-harrie-go-harrie.—Schoolcraft quoted by Rutenber, Tribes Hudson R., 398, 1872. Con-nugh-harie-gugh-harie.—Macauley, N. Y., ii, 96, 1829. Ohne-wal-a-gantle.—Ibid. O-no-ä-lä-gone'-na.—Morgan, League Iroq., 474, 1851 (Mohawk name). Oren-nygh-wurrie-gughre.—Rutenber, Tribes Hudson R., 398, 1872 (quoted form).

Onockatin. An Esopus chief who signed an agreement with Gov. Nicolls in 1665. He was a chief in the preceding year and one of the five Esopus sachems present at the treaty of 1669. Rutenber calls him Onackatin or Oghgotacton. (W. M. B.)

Onomio (O-no'-mi-o). A former Chumashan village between Pt Concepcion and Santa Barbara, Cal., at a locality now called La Gaviota.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Ononchataronon (Huron name). An Algonkin tribe or band that occupied the district near Montreal, Canada, between St Lawrence and Ottawa rs., and wintered near the Hurons. In 1642 they were but a remnant. They claimed to have been the original occupants of Montreal id. and of a large territory on both sides of the St Lawrence. They said they had been conquered and dispersed by the Hurons, who were then their enemies, and that the survivors of the war had taken refuge with the Abnaki or the Iroquois or had joined the Hurons. Hochelaga, the village found on the island by Cartier in 1535, was occupied by an Iroquoian tribe, but, according to Gatschet, the remains of a second village about 2 m. from its site have been discovered. This would clear the confusion as to the stock of the former occupants of the island. Shea suggests that the names Huron and Iroquois have been transposed, which is likely. Charlevoix says that there was a tradition that the Ononchataronon were at one time at war with the Algonkin, and that they were drawn into an ambushade and entirely destroyed. He adds that at the time of his visit (1721) they had ceased to exist. This tradition, however, seems doubtful. According to the Jesuit Relations, at the general peace of 1646 the French induced the Ononchataronon to settle again on the island, but they soon scattered on account of the Iroquois. It seems they were met with as early as 1609 by Champlain, as Iroquet, one of their chiefs, was with him at this time. The missionaries described them as arrogant, given to superstition and debauchery, and very cruel. (J. M.)

Onondaga (Onoñtā'ge, 'on, or on top of, the hill or mountain'). An important tribe of the Iroquois confederation, formerly living on the mountain, lake, and creek bearing their name, in the present Onondaga co., N. Y., and extending northward to L. Ontario and southward perhaps to the waters of the Susquehanna. In the Iroquois councils they are known as Hodiseñnageta, 'they (are) the name bearers.' Their principal village, also the capital of the confederation, was called Onondaga, later Onondaga Castle; it was situated from before 1654 to 1681 on Indian hill, in the present town of Pompey, and in 1677 contained 140 cabins. It was removed to Butternut cr., where the fort was burned in 1696. In 1720 it was again removed to Onondaga cr., and their present reserve is in that valley, a few miles s. of the lake (Beauchamp, inf'n, 1907).

The Onondaga of Grand River res., Canada, have 9 clans, namely: Wolf, Tortoise (Turtle?), Bear, Deer, Eel, Beaver, Ball, Plover (Snipe?), and Pigeonhawk. The Wolf, Bear, Plover, Ball, and Pigeonhawk clans have each only one federal chiefship; the Beaver, Tortoise, and Eel clans have each two federal chiefships, while the Deer clan has three. The reason for this marked difference in the quotas of chiefships for the several clans is not definitely known, but it may be due to the adoption of groups of persons who already possessed chiefship titles. In federal ceremonial and social assemblies the Onondaga by right of membership therein take their places with the tribal phratry of the "Three Brothers," of which the Mohawk and the Seneca are the other two members; but in federal councils—those in which sit the federal representatives of all the five (latterly six) Iroquois tribes—the Onondaga tribe itself constitutes a tribal phratry, while the Mohawk and the Seneca together form a second, and the Oneida and the

OTODAIENDO, ONONDAGA CHIEF AND FIRE-KEEPER

Cayuga originally, and latterly the Tuscarora, a third tribal phratry. The federal council is organized on the basis of these three tribal phratries. The functions of the Onondaga phratry are in many respects similar to those of a judge holding court with a jury. The question before the council is discussed respectively by the Mohawk and Seneca tribes on the one side, and then by the Oneida, the Cayuga, and, latterly, the Tuscarora tribes on the other, within their own phratries. When these two phratries have independently reached the same or a differing opinion, it is then submitted to the Onondaga phratry for confirmation or rejection. The confirmation of a common opinion or of one of the two differing opinions makes that the decree of the council. In refusing to confirm an opinion the Onondaga must show that it is in conflict with established custom or with public policy; when two differing opinions are rejected the Onondaga may suggest to the two phratries a course by which they may be able to reach a common opinion; but the Onondaga may confirm one of two differing opinions submitted to it. Each chieftain has the right to discuss and argue the question before the council either for or against its adoption by the council, in a speech or speeches addressed to the entire body of councilors and to the public.

Champlain related that in 1622 the Montagnais, the Etchemin, and the Hurons had been engaged for a long time in seeking to bring about peace between themselves and the Iroquois, but that up to that time there was always some serious obstacle to the consummation of an agreement on account of the fixed distrust which each side had of the faith of the other. Many times did they ask Champlain himself to aid them in making a firm and durable peace. They informed him that they understood by making a treaty that the interview of the ambassadors must be amicable, the one side accepting the words and faith of the other not to harm or prevent them from hunting throughout the country, and they on their side agreeing to act in like manner toward their enemies, in this case the Iroquois, and that they had no other agreements or compacts precedent to the making of a firm peace. They importuned Champlain many times to give them his advice in this matter, which they promised faithfully to follow. They assured him that they were then exhausted and weary of the wars which they had waged against each other for more than fifty years, and that, on account of their burning desire for revenge for the murder of their kin and friends, their ancestors had never before thought of peace. In this last statement is probably found approximately the epoch of that historic feud mentioned in the Jesuit Relation for 1660 (chap. II) and by Nicholas Perrot, which made the Iroquois tribes, on the one hand, and the Algonkin on the Ottawa and St. Lawrence r., on the other, inveterate enemies, although this may have been but a renewal and widening of a still earlier quarrel. In 1535 Cartier learned from the Iroquoian tribes on the St. Lawrence that they were continually tormented by enemies dwelling to the southward, called Tondamani (probably identical with Tsonnontouan, or Seneca, a name then meaning 'Upper Iroquois'), who continually waged war on them.

In Sept. 1655 the Onondaga sent a delegation of 18 persons to Quebec to confer with Governor de Lauson and with the Algonkin and Hurons. The Onondaga spokesman used 24 wampum belts in his address; the first 8 were presents to the Hurons and the Algonkin, whose leading chiefs were there; each present had its own particular name. The Onondaga professed to speak for the "four upper Iroquois nations," namely, the Seneca, Cayuga, Oneida, and Onondaga, thus leaving only the Mohawk, the "lower Iroquois," from this peace conference, but the Onondaga speaker promised to persuade the Mohawk to change their minds and to make peace. The Onondaga asked for priests to dwell among them and for French soldiers to aid them in their war against the Erie.

In May 1657, 10 years after the dispersion of the Hurons from their motherland, the Onondaga sought by the giving of numerous presents and by covert threats of war to persuade the Hurons who had fled to the vicinity of Quebec to remove to their country and to form with them a single people. The Mohawk and the Seneca also were engaged in this business. Finally, the Hurons were forced to submit to the persistent demands of the Iroquois tribes.

In 1686 the Onondaga were at war against the Cherermons (Shawnee?). They were divided into two bands, one of 50 and another of 250, 50 of the latter being from other tribes. But in 1688 the Onondaga were much under French influence and were regarded as the chief among the Iroquois tribes.

In 1682, at Albany, the Onondaga, with the Mohawk, the Oneida, the Cayuga, and the Seneca, entered into a treaty of peace with the commissioners from the colony of Maryland, who contracted not only for the white settlers, but also for the Piscataway Indians.

With the exception of a part of the Seneca, the Onondaga were the last of the five tribes originally forming the League of the Iroquois to accept fully the principles of the universal peace proposed by Dekanawida and Hiawatha.

Early in 1647 a band of Onondaga on approaching the Huron country was defeated by a troop of Huron warriors, the Onondaga chief being killed and a number taken prisoners. Among the latter was Annenraes, a man of character and authority among the Onondaga. In the following spring he learned that some of the Hurons who had been bitterly disappointed because his life had been spared intended to kill him. To some of his Huron friends he related what he had heard, and that he intended to escape to his own country. His resolution, with the reason for making it, having been reported to the leading Huron chiefs of the council, they concluded to aid him in his purpose, trusting that he would render them some valuable service in return. Giving him some presents and provisions, they sent him off secretly at night. Crossing L. Ontario, he unexpectedly encountered 300 Onondaga making canoes to cross the lake for the purpose of avenging his death (believing he had been killed by the Hurons), and awaiting the arrival of 800 Seneca and Cayuga reinforcements. His countrymen regarded Annenraes as one risen from the dead. He so conducted himself that he persuaded the 300 Onondaga to give up all thought of war for that of peace, whereupon the band, without waiting for the expected reinforcements, returned to Onondaga, where a tribal council was held, in which it was resolved to send an embassy with presents to the Hurons for the purpose of commencing negotiations for peace. The chief of this embassy was by birth a Huron named Soionés, so naturalized in the country of his adoption that it was said of him that "no Iroquois had done more massacres in these countries, nor blows more wicked than he." He was accompanied by three other Hurons, who had not long been captives at Onondaga. The embassy arrived at St Ignace July 9, 1647, finding the Hurons divided as to the expediency of acquiescing in the Onondaga proposals, the Bear tribe of the Hurons justly fearing the duplicity of the enemy even though bearing presents. But the Rock tribe and many villages desired the conclusion of peace in the hope that a number of their kin, then captive at Onondaga, would be returned to them. After many councils and conferences it was found expedient to send an embassy to Onondaga in order the better to fathom this matter. For presents the Hurons took valuable furs, while the Iroquois Onondaga used belts of wampum. The Huron embassy was well received at Onondaga, where a month was spent in holding councils. Finally the Onondaga resolved to send back a second embassy, headed by Skanawati (Scandaouati), a federal chieftain, 60 years of age, who was to be accompanied by two other Onondaga and by 15 Huron captives. One of the Huron embassy remained as a hostage. This embassy was 30 days on the way, although it was in fact only 10 days' journey. Jean Baptiste, the returning Huron delegate, brought back 7 wampum belts of the largest kind, each composed of 3,000 or 4,000 beads. By these belts the Onondaga sought to confirm the peace, assuring the Hurons that they could hope for the deliverance of at least 100 more of their captive kin. The Onondaga desired this peace not only because the life of Annenraes had been spared, but also because they were jealous lest the Mohawk, who had become insolent from their victories and were overbearing even to their allies, might become too much so should the Hurons fail to unite all their forces against them, and further because of fear of the power of the Conestoga. In this Onondaga project of peace the Cayuga and Oneida showed favorable interest, but the Seneca would not listen to it, and the Mohawk were still more averse to it as they were jealous of what had been done by the Onondaga. Hence these last two tribes sent forces to assail the village of St Ignace at the end of the winter of 1647-48. The following incidents show the character of some of the chief men and statesmen of the Onondaga:

Early in Jan. 1648 the Hurons decided to send another embassy to Onondaga. They sent 6 men, accompanied by one of the 3 Onondaga ambassadors then in their country, the other two, including Skanawati, the head of the Onondaga embassy, remaining as hostages. But unfortunately the new Huron embassy was captured and killed by a force of 100 Mohawk and Seneca who had come to the borders of the Huron country. The Onondaga accompanying this embassy was spared, and two Hurons escaped. Early in April, when the distressing news reached the ears of Skanawati, the proud Onondaga ambassador remaining with the Hurons as a hostage, he suddenly disappeared. The Hurons believed that he had stolen away, but, a few days after his disappearance, his corpse was found in the forest lying on a bed of fir branches, where he had taken his own life by cutting his throat. His companion, who was notified in order to exonerate the Hurons, said that the cause of his despair was the shame he felt at the contempt shown for the sacredness of his person by the Seneca and the Mohawk in going to the Huron country and massacring the Huron people while his life was in pledge for the keeping of the faith of his people. Of such men was the great federal council of the Iroquois composed.

The Onondaga had good reason for fearing the Conestoga, for the Jesuit Relation for 1647-48 states that in a single village of the latter people there were at that time 1,300 men capable of bearing arms, indicating for this village alone a population of more than 4,500.

At this time the Conestoga chiefs, through two messengers, informed the Hurons that if they felt too weak to defend themselves they should send the Conestoga word by an embassy. The Hurons eagerly seized this opportunity by sending on this mission 4 Christian Indians and 4 "infidels," headed by one

Charles Ondaaiondiont. They arrived at Conestoga early in June 1647. The Huron deputies informed their Conestoga friends that they had come from a land of souls, where war and the fear of their enemies had spread desolation everywhere, where the fields were covered with blood and the lodges were filled with corpses, and they themselves had only life enough left to enable them to come to ask their friends to save their country, which was drawing rapidly toward its end. This spirited but laconic address moved the Conestoga to send an embassy into the Iroquois country to urge on the Iroquois the advantage of making a lasting peace with their Huron adversaries. Jean Baptiste, a Huron ambassador mentioned before, being at Onondaga at the end of summer, learned that this embassy of the Conestoga had reached the Iroquois country, as he even saw some of the Conestoga presents. It was the purpose of the Conestoga to bring about firm peace with the Hurons and the Onondaga, the Oneida and the Cayuga, and, if possible, the Seneca, and to renew the war against the Mohawk, should they then refuse to become parties to it. The Conestoga did not fear the Mohawk. The Jesuit Relation for 1660 states that about the year 1600 the Mohawk had been greatly humbled by the Algonkin, and that, after they had regained somewhat their former standing, the Conestoga, in a war lasting 10 years, had nearly exterminated the Mohawk, who since, however, had partially recovered from the defeat.

Many of the Onondaga joined the Catholic Iroquois colonies on the St Lawrence, and in 1751 about half the tribe was said to be living in Canada. On the breaking out of the American Revolution in 1775 nearly all the Onondaga, together with the majority of the other Iroquois tribes, joined the British, and at the close of the war the British government granted them a tract on Grand r., Ontario, where a portion of them still reside. The rest are still in New York, the greater number being on the Onondaga res., and the others with the Seneca and Tuscarora on their several reservations.

The Onondaga made or joined in treaties with the state of New York at Ft Schuyler (formerly Ft Stanwix), Sept. 12, 1788; Onondaga, Nov. 18, 1793; Cayuga Ferry, July 28, 1795; Albany, Feb. 25, 1817, Feb. 11, 1822, and Feb. 28, 1829. They also joined in treaties between the Six Nations and the United States at Ft Stanwix, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1784; Ft Harmar, O., Jan. 9, 1789; Canandaigua, N. Y., Nov. 11, 1794, and Buffalo Creek, N. Y., Jan. 15, 1838.

In 1660 the Jesuits estimated the Onondaga at about 1,500 souls, while Greenhalgh in 1677 placed them at 1,750, probably their greatest strength. Later authorities give the numbers as 1,250 (1721), 1,000 (1736), 1,300 (1765), and 1,150 (1778), but these figures do not include those on the St Lawrence. In 1851 Morgan estimated their total number at about 900, including 400 on Grand r. In 1906 those in New York numbered 553, the rest of the tribe being with the Six Nations in Canada.

The Onondaga towns, so far as known, were Ahaouete, Deseroken (traditional), Gadoquat, Gannentaha (mission and fort, Kancenda), Gistwiahna, Onondaga, Onondaghara, Onondahgegahgeh, Onontatacet, Otiahanague, Teionnontatases, Tgasunto, Touenho (Goienho), Tueadasso, and some transient hunting and fishing hamlets.

Onondaga. The former chief Onondaga town of central New York, whose site and name were shifted from time to time and from place to place. Within its limits formerly lay the unquenched brands of the Great Council Fire of the League of the Iroquois. During the American Revolution, Washington found it necessary to send an army under Gen. Sullivan to punish the Iroquois tribes for their cruel and bloody work in pursuance of their alliance with Great Britain. The chastisement was so thoroughly administered by the total destruction of more than 40 Iroquois villages and the growing crops surrounding them, that the integrity of the League was disrupted and the scattered remnants forced to seek shelter in Canada and elsewhere. Finally, on Grand r., Ontario, the brands of the Great Council Fire of the League were rekindled by the allied portions of all the tribes of the Six Nations, and here the fire is still burning. The portions of the tribes which elected to remain in New York relighted a fire at Onondaga and sought to reestablish the ancient form of their government there, in order to formulate united action on questions affecting their common interests; but this attempt was only partly successful, since the seat of government had forever departed. The establishment at Onondaga of the seat of federal power by the founders of the League of the Iroquois, made Onondaga not only one of the most important and widely known towns of the Iroquois tribes, but also of North America n. of Mexico. At the zenith of the power of the Iroquois it was the capital of a government whose dominion extended from the Hudson r. on the e. to the falls of the Ohio and L. Michigan on the w., and from Ottawa r. and L. Simcoe on the n. to the Potomac on the s. and the Ohio in the s. w.

Around the Great Council Fire of the League of the Iroquois at Onondaga, with punctilious observance of the parliamentary proprieties recognized in Indian diplomacy and statecraft, and with a decorum that would add grace to many legislative assemblies of the white man, the federal senators of the Iroquois tribes devised plans, formulated policies, and defined principles of government and political action which not only strengthened their state and promoted their common welfare, but also deeply affected the contemporary history of the whites in North America. To this body of half-clad federal chieftains were repeatedly made overtures of peace and friendship by two of the most powerful kingdoms of Europe, whose statesmen often awaited with apprehension the decisions of this senate of North American savages.

The sites with their approximate dates here ascribed to Onondaga are those identified by Clark, Beauchamp, and others, and listed by Beauchamp in the notes to his map (Jes. Rel., Thwaites ed., LI, 294, 1899): The site in 1600 was probably 2 m. w. of Cazenovia and e. of West Limestone cr., Madison co., N. Y. Two sites of towns are accredited to 1620, the one $2\frac{1}{2}$ m. s. w. and the other 1 m. s. of Delphi, Onondaga co., N. Y. The site of 1630 was $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. n. w. of Delphi; that of 1640 was about 1 m. s. of Pompey Center, Onondaga co., on the e. bank of West Limestone cr. That of 1655, in which was established the mission of Saint Jean Baptiste, was about 2 m. s. of the present Manlius, in the same county, on what is called Indian hill; the Jesuit Relation for 1658 says that this town was large and was called "Onnontaghe . . . because it was on a mountain." This town, with its site, is probably identical with that visited by Greenhalgh in 1677, and described as large, unpalisaded, consisting of about 140 houses, and situated on a very large hill, the bank on each side extending at least 2 m., all cleared land and planted with corn. Greenhalgh learned that there was another village of 24 houses situated 2 m. westward; he estimated the Onondaga warriors at about 350. The site of 1696 was 1 m. s. of Jamesville, e. of Butternut cr., Onondaga co. Count Frontenac burned this town in 1696. The site of 1743 was e. of the creek and n. of the present reservation in Onondaga co., while that of 1756 was w. of the creek. The site of 1779 was that of one of the 3 towns plundered and burned in April by the troops of Col. Van Schaick; they were situated within 2 m. of one another and contained 30 to 40 houses. In 1655 the mission of Sainte Marie de Gannentaa was founded, on the shore of L. Onondaga, 12 m. n. of the mission of St Jean Baptiste; it was also called Sainte Marie du Lac de Gannentaa. To this mission village, which was abandoned in 1658, the Jesuits brought 5 small cannon. For the use of the mission the French Governor Lauson, Apr. 12, 1656, granted to the Jesuit fathers "10 leagues of space in every direction, to wit, 10 leagues of front and 10 leagues in depth—and in the place where they shall choose to establish themselves in the country of the Upper Iroquois called Onondageorons, be it in the town or near the town of Onondage, or at Gannentaa, . . . the said place and extent of 10 leagues square is to be possessed by the said reverend Jesuit fathers, their successors and assigns, in freehold forever." This grant was made evidently without the knowledge or consent of the Onondaga and without any compensation or emolument to them, a course of procedure quite in contrast with that of the Dutch and the English colonists in New York, but on the other hand in close accord with the policy of Gov. Winthrop of Massachusetts, tersely expressed in the formula that "if we leave them sufficient for their use, we may lawfully take the rest, there being more than enough for them and us." This doctrine was embodied into law by the General Court of Massachusetts in 1633, justifying its action by Biblical citation.

From the Jesuit Relations it is learned that under the operation of the principle of conferring citizenship by adoption into some definite stream of kinship common to the Iroquois state, there were colonized at Onondaga persons and families from at least 7 different tribes. According to the same authority (Thwaites ed., LXVI, 203, 1900) the Jesuit missions to the Onondaga and the Seneca were abandoned in 1709, and in 1711 a French expedition built a blockhouse at Onondaga, 24½ ft long and 18 ft wide, which Peter Schuyler ordered destroyed along with other building material as "there was other wood ready to build a chappell" (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 249, 1855).

Of the Onondaga of 1682, Father Jean de Lamberville (Jes. Rel., Thwaites ed., LXII, 1900) wrote the following interesting facts: "I found on my arrival the Iroquois of this town occupied in transporting their corn, their effects, and their lodges to a situation 2 leagues from their former dwelling-place where they have been for 19 years. They made this change in order to have nearer to them the convenience of firewood, and fields more fertile than those which they abandoned." This was probably the town visited by Greenhalgh in 1677. (J. N. B. H.)

Arnonioge.—Lamberville, letter, in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., III, 488, 1853 (misprint for Onnontaguë). Kanátágo'wá.—Morgan, League Iroq., II, 87, 1904. Onondagah.—N. Y. Doc. Col. Onondaghara ('it-mountain top'). A former Onondaga village which, according to Macauley, was the largest of five "in the extent of 8 miles." It was situated on Onondaga r., 3 m. E. of Onondaga Hollow, N. Y., and contained about 50 houses in 1829. (J. N. B. H.)

Onondagharia.—Macauley, Hist. N. Y., II, 177, 1829.

Onondahgegahgeh ('place of the Onondaga'). A former Onondaga village w. of Lower Ebenezer, Erie co., N. Y. Part of the Onondaga lived there after the American Revolution until the Buffalo Creek res. was sold in 1838. (W. M. B.)

Onondakai ('Destroy Town'). A Seneca chief who signed the treaty of 1826. His name is also given as Gonondagie, and, more exactly, as Oshagonondagie. 'He Destroys the Town,' written "Straw Town" in the treaty of 1815, Oosaukauuendauki in 1797. He was one of those whose remains were reinterred at Buffalo in 1884. The name was a favorite one, but, as applied to George Washington and some French governors, has a slightly different form. (W. M. B.)

Onondarka ('on a hill'). A Seneca town N. of Karaghyadirha, on Guy Johnson's map of 1771 (Doc. Hist. N. Y., IV, 1090, 1851). (W. M. B.)

Onontatacet ('one goes around a hill or mountain'). A former Onondaga village located on the Charlevoix map of 1745 on Seneca r., N. Y. It was not a Cayuga village, as some assert. (J. N. B. H.)

Onopa ('salt houses.'—Och). A former Nevome pueblo 9 leagues w. of Bacanora, at the present Santa Rosalia, Sonora, Mexico. It was the seat of a Spanish mission dating from 1677. Pop. 171 in 1678, 76 in 1730.

Santa Rosalia de Onopa.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 346, 1857. Sta. Rosalia Onapa.—Zapata (1678) cited by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 245, 1886.

Onowaragon. An Onondaga who succeeded a chief of the same name. The latter was a French partisan and was condoled in 1728. The former attended a council with Gov. Beauharnois in 1742, being the Onondaga speaker. Weiser, who lodged in his house in 1743, calls him Annawaragon. He may have been the Kayenwarygoa who attended the Boston council of 1744, but this is doubtful. (W. M. B.)

Ontarahronon ('lake people.'—Hewitt). An unidentified sedentary tribe probably living s of St Lawrence r. in 1640.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 35, 1858.

Ontariolite. A mineral; according to Dana (Text-book Mineralogy, 435, 1888), "a variety of scapolite occurring in limestone at Galway, Ontario, Canada. Formed with the suffix -lite, from Greek λίθος, a stone, from Ontario, the name of a lake and a Canadian province. The word is of Iroquoian origin, signifying, according to Hale (Iroq. Book of Rites, 176, 1883) 'the great lake,' from Huron ontara or the Iroquois oniatará, 'lake,' and -iō, a suffix meaning 'great,' or later, 'beautiful,' hence perhaps 'beautiful lake.' (A. F. C.)

Ontianyadi (Oñi-anyadi, 'grizzly-bear people'). A Biloxi clan.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 243, 1897.

Ontikehomawek. An early village of the Stockbridge tribe in Rensselaer co., N. Y. (W. M. B.)

Ontonagon. A Chippewa band formerly living on Ontonagon r. in upper Michigan. Regarding the origin of the name, Baraga (Otchipwe Dict., 295, 1882) says: "The proper meaning of this word is 'my dish.' An Indian tradition says that a squaw once came to the river, now called 'Ondonagan,' to fetch water with an Indian earthen dish, but the dish escaped from her hand and went to the bottom of the river, whereupon the poor squaw began to lament: nid nind ondgan, nind ondgan! Ah, my dish, my dish!

And the river was ever since called after this exclamation."

Nantunāgunk.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905 (correct form). Ootonagon band.—U. S. Stat. at Large, x, 220, 1854 (misprint). Ontonagon band.—La Pointe treaty (1854) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 224, 1873.

Ontponea. A tribe of the Manahoac confederacy, formerly living in Orange co., Va. Ontponeas.—Smith (1629), Va., i, 134, repr. 1819. Ontponies.—Jefferson, Notes, 134, 1794. Ontpankas.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 104, 1849. Outponies.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 128, 1816.

Ontwaganha. An Iroquois term, having here the phonetics of the Onondaga dialect, and freely rendered 'one utters unintelligible speech,' hence approximately synonymous with 'alien,' 'foreigner.' Its literal meaning is 'one rolls (or gulps) his words or speech.' This epithet was originally applied in ridicule of the speech of the Algonquian tribes, which to Iroquois ears was uncouth, particularly to the northern and western tribes of this stock, the Chippewa, Ottawa, Miami or Twightwigh, Missisauga, Shawnee, the "Far Indians" including the Anikwa (or Neghkariage (of two castles), the Ronowadainie, Onnighsiesanairone, Sika-jienatroene or "Eagle People," Tionontati (only by temporary association with the foregoing), Chickasaw (?), Mascoutens (?), Ronatewisichroone, and Awighsachroene. Thus the term was consistently applied to tribes dwelling in widely separated localities. Sometimes, but rarely, it may have been confounded in use with Tsaganha (q. v.), or Agotsaganha, which had a similar origin but was applied to a different group of Algonquian tribes. (J. N. B. H.)

Atsagannen.—Bruyas, Radices, 40, 1863 ('to speak a foreign language': Mohawk name). Atwagan-nen.—Bruyas as quoted by Shea in Hennepin, Deser. La., 80, 1880. Dawaganhaes.—Letter (1695) in N. Oochukham (Oo-chuk'-ham). Given by Morgan (Anc. Soc., 172, 1877) as a subclan of the Delawares, and said to mean 'ground-scratcher.'

Oohenonpa ('two boilings'). A division of the Teton Sioux, commonly known as Two Kettle Sioux, or Two Kettles; also a subdivision thereof. No mention of it is made by Lewis and Clark, Long, or other earlier explorers. It is stated in a note to De Smet's Letters (1843) that the band was estimated at 800 persons. Culbertson (1850) estimated them at 60 lodges, but gives no locality and says they have no divisions. Gen. Warren (1856) found them much scattered among other bands and numbering about 100 lodges. Cumming (Rep. Ind. Aff. for 1856) places them on the s. side of the Missouri. Hayden (1862) says they passed up and down Cheyenne r. as far as Cherry cr. and Moreau and Grand rs., not uniting with other bands. Their principal chief then was Matotopa, or Four Bears, a man of moderate capacity but exercising a good influence on his people. They lived entirely on the plains, seldom going to war, and were good hunters and shrewd in their dealings with the traders. They treated with respect white men who came among them as traders or visitors. They were on the warpath in 1866 at the time of the Ft Phil. Kearney massacre, yet it is not certain that they took an active part in this attack. By treaty made at Ft Sully, Dak., on Oct. 19, 1865, they agreed to cease attacking whites or Indians except in self defense and to settle permanently on designated lands. This treaty was signed on their behalf by chiefs Chatanskah (White Hawk), Shonkahwakkonkeshkah (Spotted Horse), Mahtotopah (Four Bears), and others, and was faithfully observed by them unless they were in the Sitting Bull uprising of 1876, which is doubtful.

Neither contagion nor war materially reduced the number of the Oohenonpa, which seems to have remained comparatively stationary up to 1887, when it was reported as 642, the last separate official enumeration. They reside on Cheyenne River res., S. Dak., with Sibaapa, Minicoujou, and Sans Arca.

Only two subdivisions were known to Dorsey, the Oohenonpah and Mawakhota. Kettle band.—Culbertson in Smithson. Rep. 1850, 162, 1851. Kettle band Sioux.—Cumming in *H. R. Ex. Oh-pah.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 139, 1853 (Yurok name).

Opament. An Algonquian village in 1608 on the E. bank of the Patuxent, in Calvert co., Md. The inhabitants were probably absorbed by the Conoy.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Opasom. See Opossum.

Opata (Pima: o-op 'enemy', o-otam 'people'). A division of the Piman family, formerly inhabiting the country between the w. boundary of Chihuahua and the Rio San Miguel in Sonora, Mexico, and extending from the main fork of the Rio Yaqui, about lat. 28° 30', to 31°, just below the n. boundary of Arizona, most of them being settled about the headwaters of Yaqui and Sonora rs. They call themselves Joyl-ra-na, 'village people.'

OPATA MAN. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

Physically the Opata may be considered good specimens of the Indian race. They are not large in stature, but are well-proportioned; their complexion is not so dark as that of the Yaqui; their features are regular and agreeable.

Prior to the advent of the Spanish missionaries, to whose efforts they readily yielded, the habits and customs of the Opata were generally akin to those of the Pima and Papago n. and w. They are described as of a submissive disposition, with much regard for honesty and morality, and have always been friendly to the Mexican Government in all the revolutions and civil dissensions, except in 1820, when a portion of them rebelled in consequence of the injustice of a government officer. After several engagements in which the natives displayed great bravery, they were compelled to submit, owing to the exhaustion of their ammunition and the great superiority in number of the opposing Mexican forces. The humanity and justice shown their prisoners in this rebellion have been the subject of praise.

The Opata houses were formerly constructed of mats and reeds, with foundations of stone, and were more durable than those of most of their neighbors. Caves were also inhabited to some extent by both the Opata proper and the Jova, even in historic times. Owing to the ruggedness of the country they inhabited, the tribe was divided into petty isolated communities, among which dissension frequently arose, sometimes ending in actual hostility. Thus, the inhabitants of Sinoquipe and Banamichi, in the Sonora valley, were once confederated against those of Huepac and Aconchi, immediately s. This led to the construction outside the villages of defensive works of volcanic rock, where an entire settlement or several allied settlements could resort in event of intertribal irruption. Besides this hostility, the tribe was constantly harassed in former times by the Jano, Jocomé, and Suma—warlike tribes believed to have been subsequently absorbed by the Apache. While, as a result of such invasions, a number of Opata villages near the Sonora-Chihuahua frontier were abandoned by their inhabitants, the inroads of these bands made no such lasting impression as those in later years by the Apache proper. When unmolested, the Opata cultivated small garden patches in the canyons, which were nourished by water from the mesas, the drift therefrom being arrested by rows of stones. Hrdlicka (Am. Anthropol., vi, 74, 1904) says there remain no apparent traces of tribal organization among them. They have lost their language, as well as their old religious beliefs and traditions, dress like the Spanish Mexicans, and are not distinguishable in appearance from the laboring classes of Mexico. Their chief occupation is agriculture, their crops consisting principally of maize, beans, melons, and chile. Some of the men are employed as laborers. The Jesuit census of 1730 (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 513-14, 1883) gives the population, including the Eudeve and Jova, as nearly 7,000. Hardy (Trav. in Mex., 437, 1829) estimated them at 10,000. They are now so completely civilized that only 44 Opata were recognized as such by the national census of 1900.

The chief tribal divisions were Opata proper, Eudeve, and Jova. Other divisions have been mentioned, as the Segui (Tegui), Teguma, and Coguinachi (Velasco in Bol. Soc. Mex. Geog. Estad., 1st s., x, 705, 1863); and Orozco y Berra (Geog., 343, 1864) adds a list of villages included in each. As the divisions last named are merely geographic, without linguistic or ethnic significance, they soon dropped from usage.

The villages of the Opata proper, so far as known, were: Aconchi, Arizpe, Babispe, Bacuachi, Baquigopa, Baseraca, Batepito, Batesopa, Cabora, Comupatrico, Corazones, Corodeguachi (Fronteras), Cuchuta, Cuchuveratzi, Distancia, Guepacomatzi, Huachinera, Huehuerigita, Huepac, Jamaica, Los Otates, Metates, Marysiche, Mochilagua, Motepori, Nacori, Nacosari, Naideni, Oposura, Oputo, Pivipa, Quitamac, Sahuaripa, Suya, Tamichopa, Tepachi, Terapia, Teras, Teuricachi, Tizonazo, Toapara, Ures, Vallecillo, and Yecora. For the villages belonging to the other divisions mentioned above, see under their respective names. See also Cronóroco. The principal authority on the Opata during the mission period is the Rudo Ensayo, an anonymous account written by a Jesuit missionary about 1763 and published in 1863. (F. W. H.)

Opechancanough. A Powhatan chief, born about 1545, died in 1644. He captured Capt. John Smith shortly after the arrival of the latter in Virginia, and took him to his brother, the head-chief Powhatan (q. v.). Some time after his release, Smith, in order to change the temper of the Indians, who jeered at the starving Englishmen and refused to sell them food, went with a band of his men to Opechancanough's camp under pretense of buying corn, seized the chief by the hair, and at the point of a pistol marched him off a prisoner. The Pamunkey brought boat-loads of provisions to ransom their chief, who thereafter entertained more respect and deeper hatred for the English. While Powhatan lived Opechancanough was held in restraint, but after his brother's death in 1618 he became the dominant leader of the nation, although his other brother, Opitchapan, was the nominal head-chief. He plotted the destruction of the colony so secretly that only one Indian, the Christian Chanco, revealed the conspiracy, but too late to save the people of Jamestown, who at a sudden signal were massacred, Mar. 22, 1622, by the natives deemed to be entirely friendly. In the period of intermittent hostilities that followed, duplicity and treachery marked the actions of both whites and Indians. In the last year of his life, Opechancanough, taking advantage of the dissensions of the English, planned their extermination. The aged chief was borne into battle on a litter when the Powhatan, on Apr. 18, 1644, fell upon the settlements and massacred 300 persons, then as suddenly desisted and fled far from the colony, frightened perhaps by some omen. Opechancanough was taken prisoner to Jamestown, where one of his guards treacherously shot him, inflicting a wound of which he subsequently died.

Opelousa (probably 'black above', i. e. 'black hair' or 'black skull'). A small tribe formerly living in s. Louisiana. It is probable that they were identical with the Onquilouzas of La Harpe, spoken of in 1699 as allied with the Washa and Chaouacha, wandering near the seacoasts, and numbering with those two tribes 200 men. This would indicate a more southerly position than that in which they are afterward found, and Du Pratz, whose information applies to the years between 1718 and 1730, locates the Oqué-Loussas, evidently the same people, westward and above Pointe Coupée, rather too far to the N. He says that they inhabited the shores of two little lakes which appeared black from the quantity of leaves which covered their bottoms, and received their name, which means 'Black-water people' in Mobilian, from this circumstance. If these were the same as the Opelousas of all later writers it is difficult to understand how the change in name came about, but it is not likely that two tribes with such similar designations occupied the same region, especially as both are never mentioned by one author. When settlers began to push westward from the Mississippi, the district occupied by this tribe came to be called after them, and the name is still retained by the parish seat of St Landry. Of their later history little information can be gathered, but it would seem from the frequency with which this name is coupled with that of the Attacapa that they were closely related to that people. This is also the opinion of those Chitimacha and Attacapa who remember having heard the tribe spoken of, and is partially confirmed by Sibley, who states that they understood Attacapa although having a language of their own. It is most probable that their proper language, referred to by Sibley, was nothing more than an Attacapa dialect, though it is now impossible to tell how closely the two resembled each other. In 1777 Attacapa and Opelousa are referred to at the mouth of the Sabine r. (Bolton in Tex. Hist. Assn. Quar., ix, 117-18, 1905), but the latter are usually located in the s. part of St Landry parish, Sibley stating that in 1806 their village was "about 15 m. from the Appelousa church." At that time they numbered about 40 men, but they have since disappeared completely, owing to the invasion of the whites and the Muskhogean Indians from E. of the Mississippi. (J. R. S.)

Opossum (Rensselaer of Virginia apāstūm, 'white beast', cognate with Chippewa udbāstūm, applied specifically to a white dog). A North American marsupial, Didelphys virginiana, about the size of the domestic cat, with grayish-white hair, with face pure white near the snout, and with black ears. When captured or slightly wounded, it has the habit of feigning death, and by this artifice often escapes from the inexperienced hunter. The name, which was first mentioned in a brief account of Virginia published in 1610, has, with various adjuncts, since been extended to species of the genera Sarcophilus, Thylacinus, Belideas, Micourous, Chironectes, and Acrobates. The name enters into several compounds, as: "Opossum mouse," Acrobates pygmaeus, a pygmy species of opossum of New South Wales; "opossum rug," a commercial name for the skin of an Australian species of Phalanger; "opossum shrew," an insectivorous mammal of the genus Soledon; "opossum shrimp," a crustacean, the female of which carries its eggs in pouches between its legs. "Possum," the common aphæretic form of the name, is often used as an epithet with the meaning of "false," "deceptive," "imitative," as in the name "possum haw" (Viburnum nudum), the berries of which counterfeit the edible fruit of the black haw (V. prunifolium), but differ therefrom in being very insipid; and "possum oak" (Quercus aquatica), from the deceptive character of its leaves, which vary in shape and size and often imitate those of Q. imbricaria, and thus lead to a confusion between the two species. Used as a verb, the word means "to pretend," "feign," "dissemble," this sense, as well as that of the attributive, being derived from the animal's habit of throwing itself upon its back and feigning death on the approach of an enemy; and hence the expression "playing possum" or "possuming." The opossum of English-speaking people of the West Indies and South America is Didelphys opossum. (W. R. G.)

Oposura. A former Opata pueblo and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1644; situated on the w. bank of Rio Soyopa, n. central Sonora, Mexico. Pop. 334 in 1678, 300 in 1730. The town, now known as Moctezuma, once suffered greatly from Apache raids.

Opothleyaholo (properly Hupuehelth Yahólo; from hupuewa 'child,' he'hle 'good', yahólo, 'whooper,' 'halloer,' an initiation title.—G. W. Grayson). A Creek orator. He was speaker of the councils of the Upper Creek towns, and as their representative met the Government commissioners in Feb., 1825, at Indian Springs, Ga., where they came to transact in due form the cession of Creek lands already arranged with venal Lower Creek chiefs. Opothleyaholo informed them that these chiefs had no authority to cede lands, which could be done only by the consent of the whole nation in council, and MacIntosh he warned ominously of the doom he would invite by signing the treaty. Opothleyaholo headed the Creek deputation that went to Washington to protest against the validity of the treaty. Bowing to the inevitable, he put his name to the new treaty of cession, signed at Washington Jan. 24, 1826, but afterward stood out for the technical right of the Creeks to retain a strip that was not included in the description because it was not then known to lie within the limits of Georgia. After the death of the old chiefs he became the leader of the nation, though not head-chief in name. When in 1836 some of the Creek towns made preparation to join the insurgent Seminole, he marched out at the head of his Tukabatchi warriors, captured some of the young men of a neighboring village who had donned war paint to start the revolt, and delivered them to the United States military to expiate the crimes they had committed on travelers and settlers. After holding a council of warriors he led 1,500 of them against the rebellious towns, receiving a commission as colonel, and when the regular troops with their Indian auxiliaries appeared at Hatcherchubbee the hostiles surrendered. The United States authorities then took advantage of the assemblage of the Creek warriors to enforce the emigration of the tribe. Opothleyaholo was reluctant to take his people to Arkansas to live with the Lower Creeks after the bitter contentions that had taken place. He bargained for a tract in Texas on which they could settle, but the Mexican government was unwilling to admit them. After the removal to Arkansas the old feud was forgotten, and Opothleyaholo became an important counselor and guide of the reunited tribe. When Gen. Albert Pike, at the beginning of the Civil war, visited the Creeks in a great council near the present town of Eufaula and urged them to treat with the Confederacy, Opothleyaholo exercised all his influence against the treaty, and when the council decided, after several days of debate and deliberation, to enter into the treaty, he withdrew with his following from the council. Later he withdrew from the Creek Nation with about a third of the Creeks and espoused the cause of the Union. Fighting his way as he went, he retreated into Kansas, and later died near the town of Leroy, Coffey co. (F. H. G. W. G.)

Optuabo. A former rancheria, probably of the Sobaipuri, near the present Arizona-Sonora boundary, probably in Arizona, which formed a visita of the mission of Suamca (q. v.) about 1760-64.

Santiago Optuabo.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 371, 1889 (after early docs.).

Opoto. A pueblo of the Opata and seat of a Spanish mission established in 1645; situated on Rio de Batepito, about lat. 30° 30', Sonora, Mexico. Pop. in 1678, 424; in 1730, 248.

Oquaga (Mohawk: 'place of wild grapes,' from onē'hōkwā, 'wild grape.'—Hewitt). An Iroquois village, probably under Tuscarora jurisdiction, formerly on the E. branch of the Susquehanna, on both sides of the river, in the town of Colesville, Broome co., N. Y. It was destroyed by the Americans in 1778. According to Rutenber, a band of Tuscarora settled there in 1722 and were afterward joined by some Mahican and Esopus Indians who had been living among the Mohawk; but from the records of the Albany Conference in 1722 it appears that they were already at Oquaga at that time. In 1778 it was "one of the neatest Indian towns on the Susquehanna r."; it contained the ruins of an "old fort." O'Callaghan says the inhabitants were Iroquois and chiefly Mohawk. They numbered about 750 in 1765. Cf. Osquake. (J. N. B. H.)

Oraibi (owa 'rock,' obi 'place': 'place of the rock'). The largest and most important of the villages of the Hopi (q. v.), in n. e. Arizona. In 1629 it became the seat of the Spanish Franciscan mission of San Francisco, which was destroyed in the Pueblo revolt of 1680, the church being reduced to ashes and the two Spanish missionaries killed. During this time the pueblo of Walpi was a visita of Oraibi. Before the mission period Oraibi was reported to contain 14,000 inhabitants, but its population was then greatly reduced, owing to the ravages of a pestilence. Present population about 500. The people of Oraibi are far more conservative in their attitude toward the whites than the other Hopi, an element in the tribe being strongly opposed to civilization. Refusal to permit their children to be taken and entered in schools has been the cause of two recent uprisings, but no blood was shed. As a result of the last difficulty, in 1906, a number Oratamin. A Hackensack chief in the 17th century, prominent in the treaty relations between the Hackensack and neighboring tribes and the Dutch. After the butchery of the Indians at Pavonia, N. J., by the Dutch in Feb. 1643, 10 or 11 of the surrounding tribes arose in arms against the latter to avenge the outrage, but concluded a treaty of peace Apr. 22 of the same year. "Oratamin, sachem of the savages living at Achkin-heshacky [Hackensack], who declared himself commissioned by the savages of Tappaen [Tappan], Rechgawawanc [Manhattan], Kichtawanc [Kitchawank], and Sintsinck [Sintsinck]," acting on their behalf. This treaty was immediately followed by a new outbreak on the part of the Indians, but peace was restored and another treaty, in which Oratamin took a prominent part, was made at Ft Amsterdam [New York], Aug. 30, 1645 (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 18, 1881). On July 19, 1649, a number of leading Indians, including Oratamin, made further proposals for a lasting peace. At the close of the conference, held at Ft Amsterdam, a special gift of tobacco and a gun was made to Oratamin, while "a small present worth 20 guilders was then given to the common savages" (ibid., 25). He also took part in the treaty of Mar. 6, 1660, in behalf of his own tribe and of the chief of the Highlands, N. Y., and was present May 18, 1660, when peace was concluded with the Wappinger. A few weeks later he interceded for the Esopus Indians, and had the satisfaction of being present at the conclusion of peace with them (Nelson, Inds. N. J., 106, 1894). In 1662 Oratamin complained to the Dutch authorities of the illicit sale of brandy to his people, and on Mar. 30 of that year was authorized to seize the liquor brought into his country for sale, as well as those bringing it. On June 27, 1663, Oratamin was again called into consultation by the whites in an effort to limit the Esopus war. Two weeks later chiefs of several tribes s. of the Hackensack appeared and ratified all that had been said and done by the aged chief, primarily through whose efforts the Esopus war was brought to a close and peace declared May 16, 1664, Oratamin and three other chiefs becoming security therefor. He was asked by Gov. Carteret, in 1666, to attend a conference regarding the purchase of the site of Newark, N. J., but was then so old and feeble that he could not undertake the journey from Hackensack to that place. He probably died in 1667. His name is also written Oratam, Oratamy, Oratan, Oraton (Nelson, Names of Inds. N. J., 44, 1904). (C. T.)

Oratory. In Indian tribal life the orator held a distinguished place. To be able to state clearly and to urge eloquently one's views on a question before a council of the tribe raised a man to power and influence among his fellows. The government of a tribe was generally vested in a council composed of the chiefs of the different bands or clans, or of the elders of the tribe, and, as unanimous consent to any proposition was usually required before it could be accepted, much argumentation was characteristic of their deliberations. In the higher circle of chiefs, as well as in the societies of warriors or leading men, the orator had his function. To speak well, to plead well, to tell a story effectively was accounted a desirable gift for a man. Many occasions arose when facility in address was required, as in formal tribal negotiations or visits, in certain parts of religious ceremonies, or in purely social intercourse.

Some of the Eastern tribes had an official orator for state occasions, which office was hereditary in certain Western tribes. The native languages lent themselves to oratory. A picture full of detail and movement could be given in comparatively few words, while the symbolism inherent in the Indian's outlook upon nature gave poetry to his speech. His vivid conceptions seemed often to thrill his frame, governing his attitude, the folds of his robe, his glance, and his gestures. The Indian's oratory early impressed the white race, and scattered through the historical records of our country are bits of powerful native utterance. We have the speeches of Cornplanter, Red Jacket, Big Elk, Logan, and a host of others, all of which have the ring of true eloquence. This gift still lingers, but now, as in the past, it is most often heard in protest against unfair dealing. Standing before a commission the members of which had been using many arguments in favor of their project, the Wichita chief who had listened in silence stooped, and gathering a handful of the dry soil of his reservation, straightened himself and said, as he threw the myriad particles into the air, "There are as many ways to cheat the Indian!" Consult Mooney in 14th and 17th Rep. B. A. E. (A. C. F.)

Orcan. A village mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as situated n. or n. w. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas, the name seemingly having been given him by Ebanamo Indians, who were probably of Karankawa affiliation. In some editions of Joutel's relation the name is combined with Pion, or Peinhom. The two names may have belonged to one village or to two closely related villages. (A. C. F.)

Orchard Party. A part of the Oneida as recognized by the treaty of Albany, Feb. 2, 1827.—Indian Problem, 301, Albany, 1889.

Ordeals. An ordeal is strictly a form of trial to determine guilt or innocence, but the term has come to be applied in a secondary sense to any severe trial or test of courage, endurance, and fortitude. In accordance with these two usages of the term, ordeals among the North American tribes may be divided into (1) those used to establish guilt and to settle differences, and (2) those undergone for the sake of some material or supernatural advantage.

The ordeals corresponding closest to the tests to which the name was originally applied were those undertaken to determine witches or wizards. If it was believed that a man had died in consequence of being bewitched, the Tsimshian would take his heart out and put a red-hot stone against it, wishing at the same time that the enemy might die. If the heart burst, they thought that their wish would be fulfilled; if not, their suspicions were believed to be unfounded. A Haida shaman repeated the names of all persons in the village in the presence of a live mouse and determined the guilty party by watching its motions. A Tlingit suspected of witchcraft was tied up for 8 or 10 days to extort a confession from him, and he was liberated at the end of that period if he were still alive. But as confession secured immediate liberty and involved no unpleasant consequences except an obligation to remove the spell, few were probably found innocent. This, however, can hardly be considered as a real ordeal, since the guilt of the victim was practically assumed, and the test was in the nature of a torment to extract confession.

Intimately connected with ordeals of this class were contests between individuals and bodies of individuals, for it was supposed that victory was determined more by supernatural than by natural power. A case is recorded among the Comanche where two men whose enmity had become so great as to defy all attempts at reconciliation were allowed to fight a duel. Their left arms having been tied together, a knife was placed in the right hand of each, and they fought until both fell. A similar duel is recorded in one of the Teton myths, and it is probable that the custom was almost universal. Resembling these were the contests in vogue among Eskimo tribes. When two bodies of Eskimo met who were strangers to each other, each party selected a champion, and the two struck each other on the side of the head or the bared shoulders until one gave in. Anciently Netchilirmint and Aivilirmint champions contested by pressing the points of their knives against each other's cheeks. Such contests were also forced on persons wandering among strange people and are said to have been matters of life and death. Chinook myths speak of similar tests of endurance between supernatural beings, and perhaps they were shared by men. Differences between towns on the N. Pacific coast were often settled by appointing a day for fighting, when the people of both sides arrayed themselves in their hide and wooden armor and engaged in a pitched battle, the issue being determined by the fall of one or two prominent men. Contests between strangers or representatives of different towns or social groups were also settled by playing a game. At a feast on the N. Pacific coast one who had used careless or slighting words toward the people of his host was forced to devour a tray full of bad-tasting food, or perhaps to swallow a quantity of urine. Two persons often contested to see which could empty a tray the more expeditiously.

Ordeals of the second class would cover the hardships placed upon a growing boy to make him strong, the fasts and regulations to which a girl was subjected at puberty, and those which a youth underwent in order to obtain supernatural helpers (see Child life), as well as the solitary fasts of persons who desired to become shamans, or of shamans who desired greater supernatural power. Finally, it is especially applicable to the fasts and tortures undergone in preparation for ceremonies or by way of initiation into a secret society.

The first of these may best be considered under Education and Puberty customs, but, although some of the ceremonies for the purpose of initiating a youth into the mysteries of the tribe took place about the time of puberty, their connection therewith is not always evident, and they may well be treated here. Thus Pueblo children, when old enough to have the religious mysteries imparted to them, went through a ceremonial flogging, and it is related of the Alibamu and other Indian tribes of the Gulf states that at a certain time they caused their children to pass in array and whipped them till they drew blood. The huskanaw (q. v.), or huskany, was an ordeal among Virginia Indians undertaken for the purpose of preparing youths for the higher duties of manhood. It consisted in solitary confinement and the use of emetics, "whereby remembrance of the past was supposed to be obliterated and the mind left free for the reception of new impressions." Among those tribes in which individuals acquired supernatural helpers a youth was compelled to go out alone into the forest or upon the mountains for a long period, fast there, and sometimes take certain medicines to enable him to see his guardian spirit. Similar were the ordeals gone through by chiefs among the Haida, Tlingit, Tsimshian, and other N. Pacific coast tribes when they desired to increase their wealth, or success in war, or to obtain long life, as also by shamans who wished increased powers. At such times they chewed certain herbs supposed to aid them in seeing the spirits. The use of the "black drink" (q. v.) by Mus-khogean tribes was with similar intent, as also were the emetics just referred to in use among the Virginian peoples.

While undergoing initiation into a secret society on the N. Pacific coast a youth fasted, and for a certain period disappeared into the woods, where he was supposed to commune with the spirit of the society in complete solitude. Any one discovering a Kwakiutl youth at this time could slay him and obtain the secret society privileges in his stead. On the plains the principal participants in the Sundance (q. v.) had skewers run through the fleshy parts of their backs, to which thongs were attached, fastened at the other end to the Sun-dance pole. Sometimes a person was drawn up so high as barely to touch the ground and afterward would throw his weight against the skewers until they tore their way out. Another participant would have the thongs fastened to a skull, which he pulled around the entire camping circle, and no matter what obstacles impeded his progress he was not allowed to touch either thongs or skull with his hands. During the ceremony of Dakhpiké, or Nakhpike, among the Hidatsa, devotees ran arrows through their muscles in different parts of their bodies; and on one occasion a warrior is known to have tied a thirsty horse to his body by means of thongs passed through holes in his flesh, after which he led him to water, restrained him from drinking without touching his hands to the thongs, and brought him back in triumph. The special ordeal of a Cheyenne society was to walk with bare feet on hot coals. A person initiated into the Chippewa and Menominee society of the Midewiwin was "shot" with a medicine bag and immediately fell on his face. By making him fall on his face a secret society spirit or the guardian spirit of a N. W. coast shaman also made itself felt. When introduced into the Omaha society, called Washashka, one was shot in the Adam's apple by something said to be taken from the head of an otter. As part of the ceremony of initiation among the Hopi a man had to take a feathered prayer-stick to a distant spring, running all the way, and return within a certain time; and chosen men of the Zúñi were obliged to walk to a lake 45 m. distant, clothed only in the breech-cloth and so exposed to the rays of the burning sun, in order to deposit plume-sticks and pray for rain. Among the same people one of the ordeals to which an initiate into the Priesthood of the Bow was subjected was to sit naked for hours on a large ant-hill, his flesh exposed to the torment of myriads of ants. At the time of the winter solstice the Hopi priests sat naked in a circle and suffered gourds of ice-cold water to be dashed over them. Ordeals of this kind enter so intimately into ceremonies of initiation that it is often difficult to distinguish them.

Certain regulations were also gone through before war expeditions, hunting excursions, or the preparation of medicines. Medicines were generally compounded by individuals after fasts, abstinence from women, and isolation in the woods or mountains. Before going to hunt the leader of a party fasted for a certain length of time and counted off so many days until one arrived which he considered his lucky day. On the N. W. coast the warriors bathed in the sea in winter time, after which they whipped each other with branches, and until the first encounter took place they fasted and abstained from water as much as possible. Elsewhere warriors were in the habit of resorting to the sweat-lodge. Among the tribes of the E. and some others prisoners were forced to run between two lines of people armed with clubs, tomahawks, and other weapons, and he who reached the chief's house or a certain mark in safety was preserved. Inasmuch as the object behind most tortures was to break down the victim's self-command and extort from him some indication of weakness, while the aim of the victim was to show an unmoved countenance, flinging back scorn and defiance at his tormentors until the very last, burning at the stake and its accompanying horrors partook somewhat of the nature of an ordeal. Oregon jargon, Oregon trade language. See Chinook jargon.

Orehaone. A Cayuga chief who opposed the Jesuits and caused Father Carheil's withdrawal. He aided the English of Albany in preventing Penn's purchase of Susquehanna lands, and visited De la Barre in 1684. In 1687 Denonville seized him and sent him to France. He was then called Goiguenha [Cayuga]-Oreouahe, and often Taweeratt; also Wahawa by the Onondaga. In 1688 the Cayuga wished for "Taweeratt, the chief warrior of Cayouge, who is lamented amongst them every day." Returning in 1689, Orehaone became attached to Count Frontenac and fought for the French. He died in 1698 and was buried with high honors as "a worthy Frenchman and good Christian." (W. M. B.)

Orejones (Span.: 'big-eared people'). Indians of the N. W. coast. As the wearing of lip, nose, and ear ornaments is common among Indians on the northern coasts, Taylor (Cal. Farmer, Aug. 24, 1863) believes there can be little doubt that the word Oregon is derived from the Spanish nickname, used to distinguish them from the California Indians. Carver (Trav., ix, 76, 1778) seems, however, to be the first to employ the term Oregon to designate his great "River of the West"—the Columbia—of which he learned from the Sioux, Assiniboin, and Cree Indians.

Orejones. A former division of the Faraon Apache.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 59, 1864.

Orejones. A former Coahuiltecan tribe dwelling near the coast between the Nueces and San Antonio rs., Texas. Their residence between these rivers was made the basis of a claim to them and their relatives by San Juan Capistrano mission in a quarrel, in 1754, with Vizarron mission (Ynforme of the College of Querétaro to the Commissary General, 1754, MS.). That they lived near the coast is evident. In 1760 the San Antonio missionaries reported them in a list of coast tribes (Ynforme de Misiones, 1762, MS.). In 1780 Governor Cabello included them in the tribes along the coast between the Nueces and Ysla de los Copanes (Cabello to Croix, May 28, 1780, MS.). But that they were not the tribe nearest to the gulf appears from the statement that when, in 1754, their very near neighbors, the Pamaques, deserted their mission, Father Arricivita sought them first in their native country, but, failing to find them, "he went in to the islands inhabited by the barbarous and uncultured tribes, of which the best known are those named Manos de Perro" (Ynforme, 1754, op. cit.).

That they were Coahuiltecan rests on the enumeration, on the title-page of García's Manual (1760), of tribes in the San Antonio and Rio Grande missions speaking the same language. Of their intimate affiliation with some of these tribes there is other evidence. They were closely bound by intermarriage with the Pamaques, and in 1731 each spoke "both languages so perfectly that they were not distinguished" (Ynforme, 1754, op. cit.). According to García they spoke the same language, with only minor differences. They lived "almost together" and went together to the missions (Ynforme, 1754). They seem also to have been closely related to the Piguiques and Panascánes (or Pasnaácanes), likewise close neighbors.

The Orejones were the basis of the foundation of San Juan Capistrano mission in 1731, but with them came numerous Pamaques (Ynforme, 1754, op. cit.). Testimony given by Andrés, a Sayopin (Chayopin), in a manuscript dated May 13, 1752, states that there were Orejones at Candelaria mission on San Xavier r. (Béxar Archives), but other evidence shows that they were neophytes from San Antonio serving as interpreters. Some time before 1754 the mission of Vizarron, s. of the Rio Grande, asserted a claim to the Orejones, but this was disputed by San Juan Capistrano mission (Ynforme, 1754).

In 1762 a total of 203 "Orejones, Sayopines, Pamaques, and Piguiques" was reported at San Juan Capistrano mission (Ynforme, 1762). It was said in 1754 that the Pamaques and their neighbors, removed from their native soil to the missions, had become almost extinct. It is probable that this assertion applied also to the Orejones (Camberos, missionary at Bahía, letter to the Viceroy, MS.), although Cabello's report of 1780 indicates that some were still living near the coast between the San Antonio and the Nueces. (H. E. B.)

Orenda. The Iroquois name of the fictive force, principle, or magic power which was assumed by the inchoate reasoning of primitive man to be inherent in every body and being of nature and in every personified attribute, property, or activity, belonging to each of these and conceived to be the active cause or force, or dynamic energy, involved in every operation or phenomenon of nature, in any manner affecting or controlling the welfare of man. This hypothetical principle was conceived to be immaterial, occult, impersonal, mysterious in mode of action, limited in function and efficiency, and not at all omnipotent, local and not omnipresent, and ever embodied or immanent in some object, although it was believed that it could be transferred, attracted, acquired, increased, suppressed, or enthralled by the orenda of occult ritualistic formulas endowed with more potency. This postulation of a purely fictitious force or dynamic energy must needs have been made by primitive man to explain the activities of life and nature, the latter being conceived to be composed of living beings, for the concept of force or energy as an attribute or property of matter had not yet been formed, hence the modern doctrine of the conservation of energy was unknown to primitive thought. As all the bodies of the environment of primitive man were regarded by him as endowed with life, mind, and volition, he inferred that his relations with these enviroing objects were directly dependent on the caprice of these beings. So to obtain his needs man must gain the goodwill of each one of a thousand controlling minds by prayer, sacrifice, some acceptable offering, or propitiatory act, in order to influence the exercise in his behalf of the orenda or magic power which he believed was controlled by the particular being invoked. Thus it came that the possession of orenda or magic power is the distinctive characteristic of all the gods, and these gods in earlier time were all the bodies and beings of nature in any manner affecting the weal or woe of man. So primitive man interpreted the activities of nature to be due to the struggle of one orenda against another, put forth by the beings or bodies of his environment, the former possessing orenda and the latter life, mind, and orenda only by virtue of his own imputation of these things to lifeless objects. In the stress of life, coming into contact or more or less close relation with certain bodies of his environment, more frequently and in a more decided manner than with the other environing bodies, and learning to feel from these relations that these bodies through "the exercise of their orenda controlled the conditions of his welfare and in like manner shaped his ill fare," man gradually came to regard these bodies as the masters, the arbiters, the gods, of the conditions of his environment, whose aid, goodwill, and even existence were absolutely necessary to his well-being and to the preservation of his life. In the cosmogonic legends, the sum of the operations of this hypothetic magic power constitutes the story of the phenomena of nature and the biography of the gods, in all the planes of human culture. From the least to the greatest, there are incomparable differences in strength, function, and scope of action among the orendas, or magic powers, exercised by any group of such fictitious beings. Therefore it is not remarkable to find in many legends that for specific purposes man may sometimes possess weapons whose orenda is superior to that possessed by some of the primal beings of his cosmology. It is likewise found that the number of purposes for which a given orenda may be efficient varies widely.

The Algonquian manito, the Shoshonean pokunt, the Siouan mahopí, xubé or rather hopídi, correspond approximately, if not exactly, with this Iroquois term orenda in use and signification. Those who interpret these terms as denotive simply of what is expressed by the English words 'mystery,' 'immortal,' 'magic,' 'sorcery,' or 'wonderful,' fail to appreciate the true nature and functions of the assumed power denoted by these terms as conceived by the Indians who devised these terms.

The following are compound terms occurring in the Jesuit Relations, in which orenda is the noun element: Arendio-wane, Arendio8ane, Arendioguanne, Arendioauanné, Arendiouane, Arendiwané, Arendaonatia. See Mythology, Ot-kon, Ojaron, Religion.

Orientation. The entrance way of Indian dwellings in the open country generally faced the E. When a tribal ceremony was to take place, the Indians of the plains camped in a circle and the line of tents was broken on the E. side so as to leave an open space. If, within this circle, a smaller one was constructed of boughs and for the special rites, this also had its opening to the E. Articles used for sacred purposes in ceremonies were arranged so as to conform to the idea of orientation, and their ornamentation was made to serve that thought. For instance, the colored band on the basket drum used in the Night Chant of the Navaho was "not continuous but intersected at one point by a narrow line of uncolored wood" in order "to assist in the orientation of the basket at night in the medicine lodge" when the light was dim. The placing of prayer-sticks and other symbolic devices, as well as their colors, referred to the points of the compass (see Color symbolism). Even the drumstick used in the Navaho Night Chant ceremony must be made of four yucca leaves, which, while on the plant, pointed to the four quarters; that which was toward the E. must first be plucked, and with that from the W. forms the core of the drumstick. Again, during the initial acts of a religious ceremony the priest and his assistants must face the E. In the busk ceremony of the Creeks the four logs with which the new fire was kindled were laid crosswise with reference to the cardinal points. Tents and dwellings, except on the seacoast, generally face the E. Among the Pueblos the communal dwellings usually face the sun, and additions are rarely made toward the N.; in the older pueblos the kivas (q. v.) also were oriented. In burials orientation was not universally observed, although it was common among some of the tribes. Among the Tlingit of Alaska it was regarded as of importance, for it was believed that if the dead were not placed with their heads to the E. they could not be "reborn." In myths, legends, and rituals the E. was spoken of as "the place where dwelt the dawn and the sun." These two, the dawn and the sun, were regarded as distinct and unrelated. The dawn was the child of "mother darkness," or night, and the animating power which pervades all things; it was born anew each day, while the sun came into existence once for all in the ancient days, and was one of the lesser and visible gods. He was always the same, and was appointed to make his daily journey through the sky. In the mythical region of the sun's abode the house wherein he dwelt was oriented, so that the sun itself faced a mysterious E., whence came to it potency from the all-pervading power. From the customs of the people, from their myths and rituals as well as from their language, it is learned that the E. not only stood for the gift of physical light but symbolized the region whence men received supernatural help and guidance (Matthews, Navaho Legends; C. Mindeleff in 17th Rep. B. A. E.; Fletcher in 22d Rep. B. A. E.). As the point where the sun appeared on the E. horizon shifted with the seasons, some of the tribes set up marks to assist in observing the time of the winter or the summer solstice, when important rites took place and orientation was closely observed (see Fewkes in 15th Rep. B. A. E.). In ceremonial processions, either when entering or when within the lodge, kiva, or the field to be consecrated, the start was usually from a point facing the E., and the movement was from left to right. This "ceremonial succession" has been traced by Cushing (Am. Anthropol., v, 1893) as resulting in part from "hand usage in left and right finger counting." Among peoples where the orientation of dwellings, etc., was not observed, as on the N. Pacific coast and in mountainous and forest regions, traces of orientation are found in some of their ceremonies. Where the custom was closely observed, consciousness of the E. seemed to have been deeply seated in the native mind, and they observed an abstract orientation when not outwardly practising it. For instance, the Omaha tribal circle was composed of 10 gentes, 5 occupying the half N. of the eastern opening and 5 the southern half. When camping on the annual tribal hunt, the opening was in the direction they were going, which might be W. of their camping site, in which case the circle would be as if it had turned on a hinge at the western part, and the 5 gentes of the northern half would still be on the N. and in the same order as if the opening were at the E., and the 5 gentes at the S. would preserve their old relative position. The orientation of the tribal circle was thus at all times preserved, although the camp might not actually be so placed upon the prairie. See Cross.

Ornament. In treating of the decorative art of the tribes of northern North America it may be briefly stated at the outset that the earliest manifestations of the phenomena of embellishment were probably of instinctive kinds in which design, as we understand it, had no part. These manifestations consisted rather in the assembling of attractive objects for the pleasure they gave, the attachment of such objects to the person, or the addition of colors to the skin, the motives being to please the savage fancy, to attract the attention of others, or to simulate animals by imitating their markings. These forms of esthetic activity were supplemented in time by the application of embellishments to the dress, when that came into use, and to all kinds of possessions having close relations with the person or which were otherwise intimately associated with the life and thought of the people. Among the tribes the person was subject to varied decorative treatment. The skin was tattooed, colors were applied in various ways, and ornamental objects were attached in every possible manner. Feathers and other articles were added to the hair; pins, plugs, and pendants to the ears; labrets to the lips; and encircling bands to the waists, arms, and legs. The costume was elaborated for decorative effect and the headdress especially became a marvel of gaudy display, well illustrated in the so-called war bonnet of the Plains tribes and the still more highly developed headdresses shown in the paintings and sculptures of the middle Americans (see Adornment). But it is the embellishment of things made and used that calls for particular attention in this place, and in this field the American aborigines, and more especially the semicivilized peoples of middle America, were hardly excelled by any other known people of corresponding culture grade. Nothing with which they had to deal was left without some kind of decorative treatment, and their appreciation of the esthetic values of form and line compares favorably with that of the eastern Asiatics.

The native ornament may first be considered with respect to the several methods of execution or utilization of the elements:

(1) The sculptor's art (see Sculpture and Carving) was employed in shaping and decorating objects of stone, wood, bone, horn, and shell, and in some sections this branch is still practised with exceptional skill. Among the N. W. coast tribes totem poles, house posts, mortuary columns, masks, batons, pipes, and various implements and utensils represent the forms of beasts, men, and monsters, in relief and in the round. Although these motives usually have primarily a symbolic or other special significance and rarely take wholly conventional forms, they are employed with remarkable skill and appreciation of their decorative values. The carvings in stone, bone, and ivory of the Eskimo are particularly noteworthy, and taste is exercised in the shaping of objects of every class. The motives employed are apparently not so generally symbolic as among the Indian tribes, and life-forms are executed with the simply artistic idea more definitely in view. The excellence of this far-northern work is no doubt due in part to the introduction of implements of steel and to the influence of the art of the whites. Among the tribes of middle North America sculptural embellishment of minor works was common, and the mound-building tribes, for example, showed decided cleverness, especially in the decoration of their tobacco pipes, carving the forms of birds and beasts and even men with excellent taste. Sculpture and sculptural embellishment deal largely with symbolic and ceremonial subjects, and are almost exclusively the work of the men.

(2) Plastic ornament, the work of the modeler (see Pottery), is confined to pottery-making tribes, such as the mound-builders and the Pueblos. In pottery, as in sculpture, various beasts, as well as men and fanciful beings, were rendered in the round and in all degrees of relief in connection with utensils, implements, and other objects, and their utilization is probably due largely to the association of religious notions with the creatures represented. All were introduced under the supervision of taste, and are thus properly classed as embellishments. Formal geometric decorations were rarely executed by plastic methods, save the simple incised varieties, better classed with engraving, and the impressed or stamped varieties, which bear somewhat the same relation to the plastic art proper that engraving bears to sculpture. The potter's art, relating primarily to household affairs, is practised almost exclusively by the women. Ornamental designs worked out in the native metals, excepting where the methods of the whites have been introduced, are essentially plastic in character and execution. North of Mexico the work of the early days was confined very largely to repoussé figures executed in sheet metal. The working of metal, so far as known, is a man's art (see Metal-work).

(3) Engraved ornament (see Engraving) is executed with pointed tools on surfaces of various kinds, and has characteristics in common with both sculpture and painting. In certain branches of art it deals principally with geometric figures, but in others life motives are employed with considerable freedom, the representations running through the entire scale of convention. The work of the Eskimo executed on bone and ivory illustrates the more decidedly pictorial phases of this branch, although there are apparent traces of an earlier geometric stage of engraved design. That of the N. W. coast tribes, executed on wood, Tattooing) are applied to objects or surfaces by means of a great variety of implements and devices, and in the form of paints, dry pigments, stains, and dyes, or are pricked into the skin. They take a prominent place in the art of the northern aborigines. Color ornament, in its simplest form, consists in the application of plain colors to the person and to the surface of objects, but more commonly it takes the form of pictorial and conventional designs of wide range; and, bone, stone, and metal, embodies animal forms almost exclusively, and is always highly conventional though never fully geometric in style. That of the mound-builders, while employing life forms to some extent, is largely geometric. The Pueblos relied on the brush rather than on the graver for their ornament. Pictographic inscriptions executed in incised lines on rock, birchbark, and other surfaces, are not properly classed as ornament. Engraved decoration has closely associated with it in the potter's art a range of imprinted and stamped figures which are usually quite formal, as in the ancient pottery of the Southern and Eastern states and in the coil ware of the ancient Pueblos. Engraved design employed in heraldic, totemic, and religious art is usually the work of the men; applied to domestic art, as in ceramics, it is the work of the women.

(4) Embellishments in color (see Painting, Dry-painting, Dyes and Pigments, not infrequently, sculptured and modeled life forms, as in masks, totem poles, earthen vases, etc., are colored in imitation of nature, although generally in formal fashion. By far the most important branch of color decoration embraces conventional delineations of life forms on manufactured articles and constructions. These decorations, usually symbolic, are characteristically displayed on articles of skin among the hunter tribes, as the Sioux; on the pottery of the more sedentary peoples, as the Pueblos; and on houses, utensils, and ceremonial objects among the N. W. coast tribes. Although the free-hand methods employed in the painter's art are favorable to flowing lines and the graphic reproduction of life forms, the color ornament of some of the tribes is almost exclusively geometric, good illustrations appearing on the pottery of the ancient Pueblos and in the decoration of articles of skin by some of the Plains tribes. It is probable that the geometric character in the first of these instances is in a measure due to copyism from textile designs and, in the second, to the use of rigid coloring implements instead of brushes. The mound-builders, skilful with the graver's point, seem to have had slight mastery of the brush, although some good examples of their work in this branch have been obtained from the ancient key settlements of the Florida coast. In painting, as in engraving, symbolic designs seem to originate largely with the men and the nonsymbolic with the women, although the distinctions between the work of the sexes probably vary with the social organization and state of culture. A peculiar method of color decoration practised by some of the tribes consisted in the cutting or scraping away of portions of the surface coloring of an object, developing the design in the contrasting color beneath. It has often been assumed that native taste in the use of colors was instinctive and that harmonious results were a matter of course; but there is apparently little evidence on this point, and it is probable that the pleasing combinations observed are in large measure due to the fact that the colors available to the tribes are generally quiet in tone rather than brilliant. Colors were often symbolic, being associated with particular concepts: as, for example, green with summer; white with winter, blue with death; yellow with the east, and red with the west (see Color symbolism).

(5) Textile ornament (see Wearing), elaborated in the constructive features or units of the art and in colors associated with these, is displayed to good advantage in the weaving of the ancient and modern Pueblos and the Navaho of to-day, and also among some of the tribes of the N. W., the Shoshoni, Shapatin, and Chilkat, for example. It is usually highly geometric in style as a result of the peculiar technic. In this art even life forms take on characteristics of the construction or combination of parts, and geometric characters necessarily prevail. The same is true in general of the decorations in the allied arts of basketry, featherwork, beadwork, quillwork, netting, and embroidery (q. v.). The last named, although assuming some of the characteristics of the textile foundation on which it is superposed, frequently expresses its designs in flowing graphic forms, and the same is true to a lesser degree in the Gobelin style of weaving practised by the N. W. coast tribes. As already stated, the decorative motives of the last-mentioned tribes are in the main representative of life forms, but, with the exception of the Nootka and other of the more southern tribes, their basketry decoration is almost exclusively geometric. Featherwork had a prominent place in native art and is still common in the W., the feather-decked baskets of some of the Pacific coast tribes being marvels of tasteful and brilliant ornament. The basketry designs of the western tribes furnish striking illustrations of the native genius for decoration. So far as known the mound-building tribes had made no considerable progress in this branch. Textile art of all forms is largely the work of the women.

DESIGN WOVEN IN TULARENO BAG-
NET (POWERS)

(6) Inlaying (see Mosaic) was employed by the more advanced tribes in the decoration of objects of wood, stone, and bone, but these decorations were usually of a very simple nature and are of no particular importance in the discussion of the native ornament of the N.; the ancient Mexicans, however, executed many superb works by this method.

Associated ornaments are appended or otherwise attached to articles of dress, accouterments, utensils, etc., and consist of tassels, fringes, beads, feathers, buttons, bells, and the like (see Adornment). They are, however, not usually employed in the elaboration of designs, though effective as ornaments.

The embellishments introduced by the various methods described above into the native arts include or represent several classes of motives which, although not always readily distinguished from one another, may be grouped in a general way, as follows:

(1) The technic, having its immediate origin in technic features of the arts themselves and primarily nonideographic; (2) the simply esthetic, introduced from various sources solely for the purpose of adornment and also primarily nonideographic; (3) the simply ideographic, portraying pictorially some scene, object, or incident, or expressing in more or less formal manner some ordinary or non-sacred idea, as a name, a number, purpose, ownership, title, rank, achievement, a personal or tribal device, etc.; (4) the sacred, expressive of some religious concept, very generally delineative, and present because the concept has a significant relationship with the person or the object decorated. Employed in the various arts these diversified elements are subject to many mutations of form and meaning. Applied to objects of art or to the person, the forms of all classes of motives, significant and nonsignificant, are, to a greater or less degree, under the supervision of taste, and undergo modifications to satisfy the esthetic sense. The simplest denotive signs, for example, are not cut on an implement or utensil without attention to spacing, uniformity of outline, and neatness of finish, while realistic representations are adapted to or brought into harmony with the varying conditions under which they are employed. Motives of all classes take on different forms or receive distinct treatment in each of the arts with which they are associated, on account of differences in technic and in the material, shape, and size of the objects to which they are applied. These changes are in the direction of elaboration where this is called for, as in the filling of large spaces, and in the direction of simplicity as influenced by restricted spaces, by haste in execution, or by defective skill; and when the shapes or available spaces demand it, figures are distorted and divided without regard to representative consistency. Representations of natural forms introduced into embellishment have, in general, a tendency to become more conventional with repetition, and under the influence of the technic of some of the arts, as in weaving, they pass readily into purely conventional forms. It does not follow, however, that geometric forms necessarily originate in this way. It appears that with many primitive tribes geometric ornament comes into general use at a very early stage of culture progress, arising in technical features of the arts, in suggestions of fancy, and possibly in other ways. Graphic delineations of life forms coming into use later combine with or take the place of the conventional decorations, and in so doing are forced into the conventional mold, assuming various degrees of simplification and geometricity. There is also, no doubt, a reciprocal elaboration of the geometric forms to meet the requirements of the new associations. That highly geometric phases of decoration in many cases come into use quite early is apparent from a glance at the work of the northern tribes. In the Pueblo region the handsome earthenware of the olden time displays mainly nonrealistic geometric phases of embellishment; that of the middle period has a considerable percentage of representative elements, while that of the later time is rich in realistic motives. In the Mississippi valley and the Atlantic woodlands simple geometric decorations seem to prevail more fully among the more primitive tribes and the realistic among the more cultured. The change from the formal to the realistic is no doubt due somewhat to the gradual adaptation of decorated articles at first purely practical in function to sacred ceremonial uses. The ideas associated with ornament are greatly diversified in derivation and character, and subject to profound changes with lapse of time, with advance in culture, and with tribal mutations. The simple technic and esthetic motives are without particular ideographic associations, although ideas may be attached to or read into them at any stage of their utilization by the imaginative, symbol-loving aborigines. With all tribes devoted to the embellishing arts there is necessarily a large body of non-ideographic motives which had no significance originally or which have lost it, but it is a common practice to give to the figures names suggested by their form, often perhaps for convenience of reference merely; thus a triangular figure woven in a basket or painted on a leather case may be called a "tipi" by one people, a "mountain" by another, and an "arrow-head" by a third; a simple cross may become the morning star, a mythic animal, or a sign of the four quarters of the world. And these simple designs employed in basketry or beadwork may be so associated as to tell or suggest a story, which may be elaborated indefinitely by the primitive fancy. Again, any simple motive may suggest some symbol or sacred creature; thus a mere crooked line previously meaningless may become a serpent with a whole train of superstitions attached; or it may be made to stand for lightning, the shaft of the gods; or it may be assumed to represent a river about which the fathers have fabricated a myth. Ornament belonging to or derived from religious and other symbolic forms of art, however, is originally fully burdened with associated ideas. The art of a highly religious people is thus especially rich in ideographic elements, and the character of these elements is in a large measure determined by the nature of the particular environment. An agricultural people, for example, occupying an arid region and devoting much attention to the ceremonial bringing of rain, employs a great number of symbols representing clouds, lightning, rain, water, and water animals, and these are introduced freely into its decorative art. A maritime people, depending on the products of the sea for subsistence, embodies in its mythology the creatures of the sea and the birds and the beasts that prey upon them, and symbols depicting these have a prominent place in its ornamental art. The dominant thought of a people in other than the religious realm finds expression in pictography and in this form passes into ornament. It is observed that warlike peoples, as the tribes of the plains, devoted to military achievement, are wont to embody in their art, in association more or less intimate with their religious symbols, the signs and emblems of daring deeds, and with some of these tribes a system of military devices has arisen which constitutes a primitive phase of heraldry (q. v.). These devices, applied to shields, costumes, and dwellings, take their place in the decorative arts of the people.

Considerable diversity in the ideas associated with decoration arises from differences in the spheres of activity of the men and the women. Delineative elements having their origin in myth and ceremony, in military occupations and the chase, and in pictography generally, are largely the creations of the men; the activities of the women are connected in a great measure with the domestic establishment, and embellishments employed in the strictly domestic arts consist in large part of designs derived from non-symbolic sources or those which have associated meanings obtained traditionally, or from dreams, or such as are invented to please the fancy. However, articles made by the women for the men, as clothing and certain ceremonial objects, may be embellished with subjects pertaining to masculine activities. So different is the point of view of the two sexes that designs identical in origin and appearance, used by the men and the women respectively, have wholly distinct interpretations. It would seem that where a marked difference exists between the decorative work of the men and the women, especially among the more primitive tribes, that of the women is less distinctly symbolic than that of the men, less graphic in character, and more fully dominated by simple esthetic requirements.

Generally speaking it may be said that each tribe employs in its ornament a group of elements or motives, ideographic and nonideographic, more or less distinctly its own and variously derived, and having characteristics determined largely by the grade and kind of culture and the nature of the immediate environment. The ornament of one tribe acts upon that of a neighboring tribe and is reacted upon according to the degrees of tribal intimacy and culture relationship, and the motives with or without their associated significance pass from one to the other, undergoing changes more or less radical and giving rise to endless variants. The ornamental art of any tribe is thus, as a rule, highly composite in style and significance, being derived through a plexus of channels and conditioned at all times by the particular environment.

In view of these facts it behooves the student of ornament to approach the subjects of origin and significance with due caution. He should remember that identical or closely analogous conventional forms may have diverse origins, and that the exact significance of a given ornament, formal or graphic, must be sought, not in analogous devices of other peoples and not in explanations previously obtained, but from the particular tribe, clan, society, or individual found using it, and that a search for ultimate meanings, if not necessarily futile, is fraught with peculiar difficulties.

Oronhyatekha ('It [is a] burning sky'). A noted Mohawk mixed-blood, born on the Six Nations res., near Brantford, Ontario, in 1841; died at Augusta, Ga., Mar. 4, 1907. In his childhood he attended a mission industrial school near his home, and later entered the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, Mass., and Kenyon College at Gambier, Ohio, where he remained two years, fitting himself for Toronto University, which he afterward entered. To cover expenses during his college vacation, he hired some white men, whom he dressed in Indian garb and exhibited with himself in a "Wild West" show. While a student at Toronto, in 1860, the chiefs of the Six Nations deputized Oronhyatekha to deliver an address to the Prince of Wales (King Edward VII) on the occasion of his visit to America, the Prince inviting him to continue his studies at Oxford, which he entered under the tutelage of Sir Henry Acland, regius professor of medicine. Returning to America a graduated physician, he practised for a time in Toronto. He married a granddaughter of Joseph Brant (Thayendanegea), the celebrated Mohawk, by whom he had a son and a daughter. Oronhyatekha was an enthusiast in secret society work. He was a prominent member of the Good Templars and of the Masonic fraternity, and in 1902, at Chicago, was elected president of the National Fraternal Congress. He was founder of the Independent Order of Foresters and held the office of Grand Ranger from 1881 until the time of his death. He delivered an address at the Indian centennial at Tyendinaga, Canada, Sept. 4, 1884. One who knew him personally described Oronhyatekha as "a man of extraordinary parts. He impressed all with his remarkable refinement. The stranger would take him for a high-class Englishman, were it not for those racial marks which betrayed his Indian origin. He was an expert parliamentarian, of dignified and suave yet forceful address. He was a keen debater, poignant and witty when occasion demanded, could tell a good story, and had a faculty of withdrawing from any situation without leaving behind him rancor or injured feelings" (New Indian, Stewart, Nev., Mar. 1907). Oronhyatekha was the author of an article on the Mohawk language, printed in the Proceedings of the Canadian Institute (n. s., x, 182-194, 1865; xv, 1-12, 1878).

Orono. A Penobscot chief, born, according to tradition, on Penobscot r., Me., in or about 1688. According to one tradition he was a descendant of Baron de Castine, and although Williamson, who seems to have seen him and was familiar with his later career, is disposed to reject this story (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., ix, 82-91, 1846), yet from Orono's own admissions it is possible that he was a son of Castine's daughter, who married a Frenchman, and with her children was taken captive in 1704. Nickolar, who was related to Orono by marriage, asserted, according to Williamson, that Orono was in some way related to old Castine; moreover he asserts that Orono was not of full blood, but part white—"a half breed or more." Orono informed Capt. Munsell (Williamson, op. cit., 83) that his father was a Frenchman and his mother half French and half Indian. He had none of the physical characteristics of an Indian save that he was tall, straight, and well proportioned. Very little is known of him until he had passed his 50th year. That he embraced the Roman Catholic faith while comparatively young, and that he was only a subordinate chief until he had reached his 75th year, are confirmed by the scanty records of his history. Until 1759 Tomasus, or Tomer, was head-chief of the Penobscot, when he was succeeded by Osson, who in turn was succeeded by Orono about 1770 or 1774. These three were ardent advocates of peace at the commencement of the French and Indian war in 1754, and until war was declared against the tribe by the English colonists. In 1775 Orono and three of his colleagues went, with one Andrew Gilman as interpreter, to profess their friendship and to tender their services to the Massachusetts government. They met the Provincial Congress at Watertown on June 21, where they entered into a treaty of amity with that body and offered assistance, and afterward proved faithful allies of the colonists during their struggle for independence. Orono was held in as high esteem after the war as before; and in 1785 and 1796 entered into treaties with Massachusetts, by which his tribe ceded certain portions of their lands and fixed permanent limits to the parts reserved. At the time of the latter treaty Orono is said to have reached his 108th year. He died at his home at Oldtown, Me., Feb. 5, 1802. His wife, who was a full blood

Indian and his almost lifelong companion, survived him a few years. Orono had a son, who was accidentally shot about 1774, aged 25 years; and a daughter who married Capt. Nickolar. Orono was buried in the cemetery at Stillwater, Penobscot co., Me., in the vicinity of the town that bears his name. (C. T.)

ever, and the Osage recognize three more closely amalgamated divisions which seem, from the traditional account of them, to represent as many formerly independent tribes. According to this account, as gathered by J. O. Dorsey, the beings which ultimately became men originated in the lowest of the four upper worlds which Osage cosmology postulates and ascended to the highest where they obtained souls. Then they descended until they came to a red-oak tree on which the lowest world rests and by its branches reached our earth. They were divided into two sections, the Tsishu, or peace people, who kept to the left, living on roots, etc.; and the Wazhazhe (true Osage), or war people, who kept to the right and killed animals for their food. Later these two divisions exchanged commodities, and after some time the Tsishu Osachile.—Garcilasso de la Vega (1591) quoted by Shipp, De Soto and Florida, 299, 1841. Ugachile.—Ranjel (ca. 1546) in Bourne, De Soto Narr., II, 73, 1904. Uzashil.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Osage (corruption by French traders of Wazhazhe, their own name). The most important southern Siouan tribe of the western division. Dorsey classed them, under the name Dhegiha, in one group with the Omaha, Ponca, Kansa, and Quapaw, with whom they are supposed to have originally constituted a single body living along the lower course of the Ohio r.

Geographically speaking, the tribe consists of three bands: the Pahatei or Great Osage, Utehta or Little Osage, and Sant-sukbdi or Arkansas band. These appear to be comparatively modern, how-people came into possession of four kinds of corn and four kinds of pumpkins, which fell from the left hind legs of as many different buffaloes. Still later the tribe came upon a very warlike people called Hangka-utadnantse, who lived on animals, and after a time the Tsishu people succeeded in making peace with them, when they were taken into the nation on the war side. Originally there were seven Tsishu gentes, seven Wazhazhe gentes, and seven Hangka gentes, but, in order to maintain an equilibrium between the war and peace sides after adopting the Hangka, the number of their gentes was reduced to five and the number of Wazhazhe gentes to two. In camping the Tsishu gentes are on the left or n. side of the camping circle, and the Hangka or Wazhazhe gentes on the right or s. side, the entrance to the circle being eastward. Beginning at this entrance the arrangement of gentes is as follows: Tsishu gentes (from E. to W.): 1, Tsishu-sintsakdhe; 2, Tsedtukaingtse; 3, Minkin; 4, Tsishuwashtake; 5, Haninihkasina; 6, Tseduka; 7, Kdhun. Hangka gentes (from E. to W.): 8, Washashewanun; 9, Hangkautadhantsi; 10, Panhkawashtake; 11, Hangkashutun; 12, Wasspetun; 13, Upkhan; 14, Kanse.

The gentile organization appears to have been very similar to that of the Omaha and other southern tribes of this division, involving paternal descent, prohibition of marriage in the gentes of both father and mother, and probably gentile taboos. The functions of the various gentes were also differentiated to a certain extent. Matters connected with war were usually undertaken by the war gentes and peace-making by the peace gentes, while it was the duty of the chief of the Tsishuwashtake gens to defend any foeman who might slip into the camp-circle and appeal to him for protection. The Tsishu gentes are also said to have had the care and naming of children. Heralds were chosen from certain special gentes, and certain others monopolized the manufacture of moccasins, war standards, and war pipes. On the death of a head-chief the leading man called a council and named four candidates, from whom the final selection was made. Seven appears as a sacred number in the social organization of the Osage, but from the war and other customs of the tribe it appears that the sacred ceremonial number was usually four (Dorsey in Am. Nat., Feb. 1884).

The first historical notice of the Osage appears to be on Marquette's autograph map of 1673, which locates them apparently on Osage r., and there they are placed by all subsequent writers until their removal westward in the 19th century. Douay (1686) assigns them 17 villages, but these must have been nothing more than hunting camps, for Father Jacques Gravier, in a letter written in 1694 from the Illinois mission, speaks of but one, and later writers agree with his statement, though it must be understood as applying only to the Great Osage. Gravier interviewed two Osage and two Missouri chiefs who had come to make an alliance with the Illinois, and says of them: "The Osage and Missouri do not appear to be so quick-witted as the Illinois; their language does not seem very difficult. The former do not open their lips and the latter speak still more from the throat than they" (Jes. Rel., LXIV, 171, 1900). Iberville in 1701 (Margry, Déc., iv, 599, 1880) mentions a tribe of 1,200 to 1,500 families living in the region of Arkansas r., near the Kansas and the Missouri, and, like these, speaking a language that he took to be Quapaw. The name of this tribe through errors in copying and printing became Crevas, but the description indicates the Osage. In 1714 they assisted the French in defeating the Foxes at Detroit. Although visits of traders were evidently quite common before 1719, the first official French visit appears to have been in that year by Du Tisné, who learned that their village on Osage r. then contained 100 cabins and 200 warriors. The village of the Missouri was higher up, and a short distance S. W. of the latter was another Osage village which from later maps is shown to have been occupied by the Little Osage. Then, as always, the tribe was at war with most of the surrounding peoples, and La Harpe witnesses to the terror in which they were held by the Caddoan tribes. The Illinois were also inveterate enemies, though at one time, when driven W. of the Mississippi by the Iroquois, they fled to the Osage for protection. Charlevoix met a party of Osage at the Kaskaskia village on Oct. 20, 1721. Regarding them he wrote: "They depute some of their people once or twice every year to sing the calumet among the Kaskaskias, and they are now actually here at present." The French officer Bossu met some Osage at Cahokia (q. v.) in 1758. About 1802, according to Lewis and Clark, nearly half of the Great Osage under a chief named Big-track migrated to Arkansas r., thus constituting the Arkansas band. The same explorers (1804) found the Great Osage, numbering about 500 warriors, in a village on the s. bank of Osage r., the Little Osage, nearly half as numerous, 6 m. distant, and the Arkansas band, numbering 600 warriors, on Vermilion r., a branch of the Arkansas.

On Nov. 10, 1808, by a treaty with the United States concluded at Ft. Clark, Kans., near Kansas City, Mo., the Osage ceded to the United States all their lands e. of a line running due s. from Ft. Clark to Arkansas r., and also all of their lands w. of Missouri r., the whole comprising the larger part of what is now the state of Missouri and the n. part of Arkansas. The territory remaining to them, all of the present state of Oklahoma n. of Canadian and Arkansas rs., was still further reduced by the provisions of treaties at St. Louis, June 2, 1825; Ft. Gibson, Ind. T., Jan. 11, 1839; and Canville, Kans., Sept. 29, 1865; and the limits of their present reservation were established by act of Congress of July 15, 1870. This consisted (1906) of 1,470,058 acres, and in addition the tribe possessed funds in the Treasury of the United States amounting to $8,562,690, including a school fund of $119,911, the whole yielding an annual income of $428,134. Their income from pasturage leases amounted to $98,376 in the same year, and their total annual income was therefore about $265 per capita, making this tribe the richest in the entire United States. By act of June 28, 1906, an equal division of the lands and funds of the Osage was provided for.

Estimates of Osage population later than that of Lewis and Clark are the following: Sibley, 1,250 men (including 400 Great Osage, 250 Little Osage, and 600 of the Arkansas band); Morse (1821), 5,200 (including 4,200 Great Osage and 1,000 Little Osage); Porter (1829), 5,000; U. S. Indian Office (1843), 4,102; Schoolcraft (1853), 3,758 (exclusive of an important division known as Black Dog's band). According to the Indian Office census of 1877, they numbered 3,001; in 1884, 1,547; 1886, 1,582; 1906 (after the division of the tribal lands and trust funds had been provided for), 1,994.

The following villages were occupied by the Osage at different times: Big Chief, Black Dog, Heakdhetanwan, Intapupshe, Khdhasiukdhin, Little Osage Village, Manhukdhintanwan, Nanzewaspe, Nikhdhitanwan, Pasukdhin, Paghuukdhinpe, Santsepasu, Santsukdhin, Takdheskautsiupshe, Tanwakanwakaghe, Tanwanshinka, Wakhakukdhin, and White Hair Village. The following bands and divisions have not been identified: Shapei-nihkashina, Petkhaninihkashina, and Tatseinihkashina. (J. R. S.)

Osage. A former Miami village on Wabash r., just w. of the Mississinewa, in Miami co., Ind. It was so called from its being the residence of an Osage Indian domiciliated among the Miami, and whose name appears in treaties as Osage and Osage the Neutral (J. P. Dunn, inf'n, 1907). In 1838 the site was included in an individual reserve granted to Richardville, the Miami chief.

Oseola (also spelled Oseola, Aseola, Aseeholar, properly Asi-yaholo, 'Black-drink halloer,' from asi, the 'black drink' (q. v.), yaholo, the long drawn-out cry sung by the attendant while each man in turn is drinking). A noted Seminole leader to whom the name Powell was sometimes applied from the fact that after the death of his father his mother married a white man of that name. He was born on Tallapoosa r., in the Creek country, about 1803. His paternal grandfather was a Scotchman, and it is said the Caucasian strain was noticeable in his features and complexion. He was not a chief by descent, nor, so far as is known, by formal election, but took his place as leader and acknowledged chieftain by reason of his abilities as a warrior and commander during the memorable struggle of his people with the United States in the Seminole war of 1835. Secreting the women, children, and old men of his tribe in the depths of a great swamp, where the white troops were for a long time unable to find them, Oseola turned his energy to the work of harassing the Government forces. Maj. Dade and his detachment, the first to attack him, were cut off, only two or three wounded men escaping. Beginning with Gen. Gaines, one after another officer was placed in charge of the army sent against this intrepid warrior and his followers. These were successively baffled, owing largely to the physical difficulties to be overcome on account of the nature of the Seminole country, until Gen. Jessup, maddened by the public cry for more energetic action, seized Oseola and his attendants while holding a conference under a flag of truce—an act condemned as inexcusable treachery by the same public that had urged him on. The loss of freedom, and brooding over the manner in which he had been betrayed, broke the spirit of the youthful chief, who died a prisoner in Ft. Moultrie, Fla., in Jan. 1838. In physique Oseola was described as tall, slender, and straight, with a countenance pleasing, though of somewhat melancholy cast. See Sketch of the Seminole War, by a Lieutenant, 1836; Barr, Narr. Ind. Wars in Fla., 1836; McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, 1854; Potter, The War in Florida, 1836; Ellis, Indian Wars of the United States, 1892. (C. T.)

Osguaga. A former village of the Mohawk, consisting in 1634, when it was visited by Van Curler, of 9 houses. For a description of these, see Onekagoncka.

It was situated near a large confluent of Mohawk r., between the third and fourth castles of the Mohawk, e. of the village of Cawaoge, which was about 1 m. e. of the fourth castle of that date. This may have been a town of the Wolf clan, as Van Curler learned that the principal chief of this village was known as Oguoho, i. e. 'Wolf.' It was probably distinct from Osquake. (J. N. B. H.)

Osquake. Van Curler (1624-25) in Rep. Am. Hist. Am'n 1896, 98, 1898.

Oshach. The Sun clans of the Keresan pueblos of Laguna, Acoma, Sia, San Felipe, and Cochiti, N. Mex. The Sun clan of Laguna claims to have come originally from San Felipe; that of Acoma forms a phratry with the Huwaka (Sky) clan. (F. W. H.)

OSHKOSH. (WISCONSIN HISTORICAL SOCIETY)

Oshkosh ('his hoof', or 'his nail'; cf. Oshkushi). Head-chief of the Menominee in the first half of the 19th century; born 1795, died Aug. 31, 1850. He was of the Owasse gens, and grandson of Chakau-chokama, called "The Old King," long head-chief of the tribe. Oshkosh became a warrior when 17 years of age, being one of the hundred of his tribesmen under Tomah who joined Col. Robert Dickson of the British army and participated in the capture of Ft Mackinaw, Mich., from the Americans in July, 1812. He was with the party who in 1813 made an unsuccessful attack on Ft Sandusky, Ohio, then in charge of Maj. Geo. Croghan. It was at the treaty of Butte des Morts, Mich. Ter. (now Wisconsin), Aug. 11, 1827, that he was first officially recognized as chief of the Menominee, when, in fact, he was named as chief by Cass and McKenney, the United States commissioners, in order that he might represent his tribe. Oshkosh is described as having been of medium size, possessing good sense, ability, and bravery, but a slave to strong drink, which led him, at least in one instance, deliberately to murder, without provocation or excuse, an inoffensive Indian. His name is also written Oisicos, Oskoshe, and Oskashe. His portrait, painted by Samuel M. Brookes, is in possession of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin. See Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896. (C. T.)

Oshkushi (Ukasha). The animate form of an inanimate word referring to 'hoof,' 'claw,' 'nail'; applied to a member of the social divisions of the Sank, Foxes, and Kickapoo. The division is irrespective of clan and is the cause of intense rivalry in sport. Their ceremonial color is black. (W. J.)

Oshonawan ('musty town'). An ancient Zuni settlement, now in ruins, situated s. of Ojo Caliente, N. Mex. (F. H. C.)

Osho-na.—Fewkes in Jour. Am. Eth. and Arch., I, 101, 1891.

Oshonahlawan (Osh'-te-nu'-hla-wan, 'dwelling place of the rock or cave shelter surrounded'). A companion ruin to Hlauhla, which is situated 10 m. N. N. E. of Zuni, N. Mex. (F. H. C.)

Osiquevede. Mentioned by Fontaneda, about 1575, in connection with Mogoso, Tocobaga, Carlos (Calusa), Ais, and Sonsohe, as a village or tribe of Florida below (s. from) Apalachee, Fla. (J. M.)

Osiquevede.—Fontaneda in Ternaux-Compan, Voy., xx, 40, 1841. Osiquevede.—Fontaneda Memoir, Smith trans., 27, 1854.

Oskakumukohochikam (Os Kd'kámuk Tréikám, 'arrow-bush standing'). A former Pima village in s. Arizona.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 16, 1902.

Oskawaserenhon ('dead branches have fallen'). A traditional Iroquois town of the Wolf clan; so enumerated in the list of towns in the Chant of Welcome of the Condolence Council of the League of the Iroquois. Nothing definite is known as to its situation or to what tribe it belonged. See Hale, Iroq. Book of Rites, 1883. (J. N. B. H.)

Oskelagna (yagena = 'land'). Recorded on the West Florida map (ca. 1775) as one of the former Choctaw "Sixtowns," situated probably in Jasper co., Miss. It is not, however, one of the Sixtowns recorded by Gatschet. See Oklahannali.

Oskenotoh (Os-ken'-o-toh). The Deer clan of the Hurons.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 153, 1877.

Oskuisaquamai. A fish-eating people mentioned in connection with Assiniboin, Cree, and Maskegon, in the middle of the 18th century; probably a band of Cree.

Oskuisaquamai.—Bacqueville de la Potherie, Hist. Am., i, 176, 1753. Oskuisakamais.—Dobbs, Hudson Bay, 25, 1744.

Oskuk (Os kük, 'tree standing'). A small Pima village on Gila r., s. Arizona.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 18, 1902.

Osmakmiketlp (Ösmazmik'elp). A Bella-coola village on the n. side of Bella-coola r., at its mouth, in British Columbia; it was one of the eight Nuhalk towns.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 49, 1898.

Osonee. A former village, probably of the Upper Creeks, on Cahawba r., in Shelby co., Ala.

Old Osonee.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ala. map, 1900.

Osotchi. A former Lower Creek town on the w. bank of Chattahoochee r., Russell co., Ala., 2 m. below Uchee town and adjoining Chiaha. It was settled prior to 1791 by people from Flint r., Ga., and in 1832 had 168 heads of families. In Oklahoma the descendants of the people of Osotchi and Chiaha are settled in one village.

Hoosche.—Bartram, Travels, 462, 1791. Hoositchi.—Bartram as cited by Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 142, 1884. Oosachees.—Harris, Voy., ii, 335, 1764. Odsinachies.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, iii, 80, 1854 (probably identical). Oosoochees.—Hawkins (1813) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., i, 854, 1832. Oosochu.—Adair, Am. Inds., 257, 1775. Oo-se-oo-che.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 25, 63, 1848. Oosoochees.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1814), 163, 1837. Oosoochee.—Gallatin in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 95, 1836. Oosooche.—Wilkinson (1802) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., i, 677, 1832. Outchy.—Pickett, Hist. Ala., ii, 104, 1851. Ooschees.—Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., ii, 837, 1834. Osotchi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 142, 1884. Oosachees.—Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., i, 383, 1832. Ostretchees.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 276, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 308, 1836. Ösudshi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 142, 1884. Öutchi.—Ibid. Oswichees.—Woodward, Reminis., 38, 1859. Oswichu.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1827), 419, 1837. Oswitcha.—H. R. Ex. Osotchi. A town of the Creek Nation, on Deep fork, below Ocmulgee, Okla.

O'sudshi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., ii, 186, 1888.

Ospo. A village and mission station, possibly of the Yamasee, on or near Guala (Amelia) id., n. e. Fla., in the latter part of the 16th century. In 1597, in a general attack on the missions, the church was destroyed and the priest in charge, Father

Avila, taken prisoner, but he was finally rescued after having once been condemned to the stake. See Tolemato. (J. M.)

Ospa.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 70, 1855. Ospo.—Barcia, Ensayo, 171, 1723.

Osquake (from Otsquago, 'under the rock,' Mohawk name of the creek.—Hewitt). A Mohawk band and village formerly at Ft Plain and on Osquake cr., Montgomery co., N. Y. (Macauley, N. Y., ii, 296, 1829). Cf. Osguage.

Ossaghrage (Iroquois: 'place of beaver dams.'—Hewitt). An Abnaki village in 1700.—Bellomont (1700) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 758, 1854.

Ossahinta ('Frost'). The principal chief of the Onondaga from 1830 until his death in 1846; he was born in 1760 and belonged to the Turtle clan. Ossahinta was of high character and an eloquent speaker, and was commonly known as Captain Frost. (W. M. B.)

Osse (Os'-se, 'oldsquaw duck'). A sub-branch or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 42, 1896.

Ossewingo. A town with a mixed population under Oneida jurisdiction, formerly situated, according to the Evans map of 1756, a few miles above Chenango, Broome co., N. Y. The report of Thompson and Post in 1758 (Pa. Archives, iii, 413, 1853) says, with reference to Chenango, that it is a "town of the Nanticokes, on Susquehanna, about half way between Owegey and Ossewingo," which indicates apparently that Chenango lay between the two towns mentioned and is not identical with Ossewingo, as some writers assert. See Halsey, Old N. Y. Frontier, 276, 1901. (J. N. B. H.)

Ossingsing (Delaware: assinesink, 'at the little stone,' probably referring to the heaps of small stones that the Indians were accustomed to form at certain places, especially at the foot of a hill.—Gerard). A former village of the Sintsink (q. v.) on the site of Ossining, N. Y.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 79, 1872.

Ossipee ('lake formed by the enlargement of a river.'—Maurault). A small tribe of the Pennacook confederacy formerly living on Ossipee r. and lake in Carroll co., N. H., and Oxford co., Me. Their village, of the same name, was probably on the lake. (J. M.)

Osipees.—Kendall, Trav., iii, 45, 1809. Osepe.—Treaty of 1690 in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., i, 113, 1825. Ossipec.—Penhallow (1726) in N. H. Hist. Soc. Coll., i, 71, 1824.

Ossossané ('a mound'). A former important Huron village, belonging to the Bear clan, situated between L. Simcoe and Georgian bay, Ontario. It was known under various names at different periods. In 1639 the mission of La Conception was removed there from Ihonatiria. (J. N. B. H.)

Immaculate Conception.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 177, 1855. La Conception.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 63, 1858. La Rochelle.—Jes. Rel. 1636, 123, 1858. Ossossané.—

Jes. Rel. 1639, 88, 1858 (changed in errata to Ossosane). Ossosandue.—Jes. Rel. 1637, 70, 1858. Ossosané.—Ibid., 131. Ossosandue.—Ibid., 70. Ossosané.—Jes. Rel. 1636, 123, 1858. Ossosarie.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 63, 1858 (misprint). Quevindoyan.—Mémoire of 1637 in Margry, Déc., I, 4, 1875 (sig. 'at the base of the mountain.'—Hewitt). Quienindohain.—Sagard (1636), Can., II, 422, 1866. Quienindohian.—Ibid., I, 200, 1866. Saint Gabriel.—Ibid., note. Tequenonquiaye.—Champlain (1615), Œuvres, IV, 28, 1870. Tequeunoikuaye.—Sagard (1636), Can., I, 200, 1866. Tequeunonkiaye.—Sagard misquoted in Champlain, Œuvres, IV, 28, note, 1870.

Ossuary. See Mortuary customs.

Canonchahonronon.—French writer (1666) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 47-48, 1855. Ossweh-gä-dä-gä-sh.—Morgan, League Iroq., 80, 1851.

Ostimuri. A pueblo of the Nevome, with 57 inhabitants in 1730; apparently situated in Sonora, Mexico, E. of lon. 109° and N. of lat. 29. It seems to have been a visita of and near the mission of (Santa Rosalia) Onopa, q. v.

S. Ildefonso Ostimuri.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 514, 1884.

Ostogeron. A former Iroquois village, apparently under Oneida jurisdiction, situated, according to the Brion de la Tour map of 1781, above Tuskokogie, on the E. bank of the E. branch of the Susquehanna r. This is probably an error for Chenango r. in N. Y. (J. N. B. H.)

Ostageron.—Lattré, Map, 1784. Ostogeron.—Esnauls and Rapiilly, Map, 1777.

Ostonwackin. A village occupied by Delaware, Cayuga, Oneida, and other Indians under Iroquois control on the W. branch of the Susquehanna, at the mouth of Loyalsock cr., at the site of the present Montoursville, Lycoming co., Pa. It was at one time the home of the celebrated Madam Montour, q. v.

Hist., V, 675, 1855 (the inhabitants). Ostonwackin.—Loskiel (1794) quoted by Day, Penn., 525, 1843. Ots-on-wacken.—Darlington, op. cit. Ostonwackin.—Loskiel, Hist. Miss. United Breth., pt. 2, 32, 1794. Otsuago.—Darlington, op. cit.

Ostrovki (Russian: 'little islands'). A Kaniagmiut Eskimo village on Kachemak bay, W. coast of Kenai penin., Alaska; pop. 74 in 1880.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884.

Ostyalakwa. A former pueblo of the Jemez of New Mexico; definite location unknown. Asserted to be distinct from Astialakwa.

Osht-yal-a.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 207, 1892. Ost'-yal-a-kwa.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895.

Osuktalaya (Osuk-talaya, 'hickory grove'). A former Choctaw town of the Oklafalaya, or Western party, on the headwaters of Chickasawhay r., in Neshoba or Kemper co., Miss. See Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 427, 1902.

Osunkhirhine, Pierre Paul. An Abnaki Indian of St Francis, near Pierreville, Quebec, noted for his translations, especially of religious works, into the Penobscot dialect of the Abnaki language, published from 1830 to 1844. He received a good education at Moore's Charity School, Hanover, N. H., and returned to his home as a Protestant missionary. In some of his published works (Pilling, Bibliog. Algonq. Lang., 539-40, 1891) his name appears as Wzokhilain, because it could not be more exactly transliterated into the Abnaki language.

Oswegatchie ('at the very outlet'). A former village of Catholic Iroquois under French influence, on the site of Ogdensburg, St Lawrence co., N. Y., at the mouth of the Oswegatchie. In 1748 Father Picquet began there La Presentation mission, which grew so rapidly, mainly by recruits from the Onondaga and Cayuga, that three years later the settlement numbered 3,000. The French fort La Gallette was built there about the same time. In spite of the opposition of the Iroquois confederation the mission prospered, and at the breaking out of the French and Indian war in 1754 the Oswegatchie and other Catholic Iroquois sided with the French against their former brethren. The settlement was invaded the next year by smallpox, which carried off nearly half the population. In 1763 they were estimated at about 400. They joined the British in the Revolution and at the close of the war the disorganized remnant was settled temporarily at Johnstown and later at Indian Point near Lisbon, not far from their old settlement. About the year 1806 the survivors finally joined the Onondaga and St Regis. (J. N. B. H.)

Oswego tea. A name applied to Monarda didyma, a plant used for medicinal purposes by Indians, and after them by the whites, particularly the Shakers of New York state. From the place name Oswego. (A. F. C.)

Otacta. See Outacity.

Otaguottouemin. An Algonquian tribe mentioned by Champlain (Cœuvres, iv, 20, 1870), who heard of them during his passage up the Ottawa r. in 1615. They dwelt in a sparsely inhabited desert and lived by hunting, and by fishing in rivers, ponds, and lakes. The Jesuit Relation of 1640 describes them as dwelling n. of the Kichesipirini. They seldom descended to trade with the French.

Otasite. See Outacity.

Otat. A former Diegueño settlement, tributary to the mission of San Miguel de la Frontera, on the gulf coast of Lower California, about 30 m. s. of San Diego, Cal. (A. S. G.)

Otates (from Aztec otalli, a species of cane). A ruined pueblo of the Opata, near Guachinera, e. Sonora, Mexico, about lat. 30°.

Los Otates.—Baudelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 517, 1892.

Otatchia ('crane'). A phratry of the Menominee; also a subphratry or gens. Ota'tahia wi'dishi'anna.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 42, 1896.

Otahok, Otahig. See Pekan.

Otekhistonwan ('village in the thick-et'). A band of the Wahpeton Sioux.

O-ta-har-tan.—Lewis and Clark, Diary, 34, 1808. Otalatogwan.—Riggs, letter to Dorsey, 1882. Otalitogwan.—Dorsey (after Ashley) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 216, 1897. Otagi-ato-wa.—Ibid.

Otenashmoo. A former Chumashan village at "Las Pomas," about 2 m. from Santa Barbara mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Oteroughyanento. See Ohrante.

Otherday, John (Angpetu-tokecha). A Wahpeton Sioux, son of Zitkaduta, or Red Bird, and nephew of Big Curly, chief of the Wahpeton at Lac qui Parle, Minn.; born at Swan lake, Minn., in 1801. It is said that when a young man he was "passionate and revengeful, and withal addicted to intemperance, and he lived to lament that he had slain three or four of his fellows in his drunken orgies"

(Sibley). Yet at times he manifested the same devotion to his tribesmen as he afterward showed to the whites, on one occasion, in a battle with the Chippewa at St Croix r., bearing from the field "One-legged Jim," who had been severely wounded, and, during the same action, saving the life of another Indian called Fresnière's Son. But he early became desirous of following the ways of the white men, adopting their dress, later becoming a devoted member of Dr Williamson's church, and abandoning his intemperate habits. When in 1857 the wily Inkpaduta, "too vile to be even countenanced by the Sioux," fell upon and massacred the settlers at Spirit lake, in the present South Dakota, and carried Miss Abigail Gardner and Mrs Noble into captivity. Otherday and Paul Mazakutemani volunteered to follow the outlaw's trail, rescuing Miss Gardner, but arriving too late to save the life of the other captive. At the time of the Sioux outbreak of 1862, Otherday, who had married a white woman, resided on the reservation near Minnesota r., in a comfortable dwelling built for him by the agent. When he learned that hostilities were imminent, he hastened to the upper agency and there gathered 62 of the whites, whom he guided in safety through the wilderness to St Paul, then hastened back to the frontier to save other lives and to aid in bringing the murderers to justice. To him and the other Christian Indians who aided in the rescue the missionary party of 43 were indebted for their escape to an extent not then known (Riggs). In the military campaign organized to quell the outbreak Otherday was employed by Gen. Sibley as a scout, in which capacity he rendered valued service. He participated in the battles of Birch Coolie and Wood lake, taking with his own hands two horses from the enemy and slaying their riders. "He was often in their midst and so far in advance of our own men that they fired many shots at him in the belief that he was one of the foe. No person on the field compared with him in the exhibition of reckless bravery. He was clothed entirely in white: a belt around his waist, in which was placed his knife; a handkerchief was knotted about his head, and in his hand he lightly grasped his rifle" (Heard). Otherday signed the Sisseton and Wahpeton treaty at Washington, Feb. 19, 1867. Congress granted him $2,500, with which he purchased a farm near Henderson, Sibley co., Minn.; here he resided for three or four years, but not being successful as a farmer he sold his land at a sacrifice and removed to the Sisseton and Wahpeton res., S. Dak., where the agent built a house for him. He died of tuberculosis in 1871, and was buried in a pasture on the n. side of Big Coule cr., 75 ft from the stream, about 12 m. n. w. of Wilmot, Roberts co., S. Dak.

Otiahanague. An Onondaga village at the mouth of Salmon r., Oswego co., N. Y., in the 18th century. (W. M. B.)

Otituchina (prob. 'three islands'). A former Upper Creek town on Coosa r., probably in or near Talladega co., Ala.

O tee toochinas.—Swan (1791) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 262, 1855.

Otkialnaas-hadai (^sot k'iál náas xā'da-i, 'Eagle's-legs-house people'). A subdivision of the Yadus, a branch of the Stustas, one of the greatest of the Haida families. It belonged to the Eagle clan.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Otkon. The common Iroquois descriptive epithet and name applied to any object or being which performs its functions and exercises its assumed magic power or orenda (q. v.) in such manner as to be not only inimical to human welfare, but hostile to and destructive of human life; it is the name in common use for all ferocious and monstrous beings, animals, and persons, especially such as are not normal in size, power, and cunning, or such things in which there is marked incongruity between these properties of beings. The term is often applied to fetishes and to similar things. As a qualifier it is equivalent to the English mysterious, monstrous, devilish, or rather demoniac; but as a noun, or name, to monster, demon, devil, goblin, witch, wizard. The term has found a peculiar use in a translation of the Gospels by one Joseph Onasakenrat into the Iroquois tongue (Montreal, 1880), where it is employed to translate Spirit and Holy Spirit; this is done also in a Mohawk Catechism by the Abbé F. Piquet (Paris, 1826). In both it is made the equivalent of the English 'spirit', and in both works Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost is rendered Rotkon, 'he, a human being, is an otkon', i. e. 'a demon, or spirit,' modified either by Roiatatokenti, 'his body is holy,' or by Ronikonratokenti, 'his mind is holy.' The initial o— in otkon is a pronominal affix, denotive of number, person, and gender, and meaning here the singular number, third person, and zoic gender. When the term is to be used with reference to persons or anthropic beings, the affix changes to ro—, ago—, hoñna—, or koñna—, signifying respectively, 'he,' 'one,' 'they (masculine),' and additionally to every one of these last definitions, the anthropic gender. So that Rotkon denotes 'he, a human being, is an otkon,' i. e. a demon or spirit. In grammatic form the term otkon is an adjective or attributive; its correct nominal form requires the suffix -tsera, -tsera, or -tchü', according to dialect, denoting state of being; whence otkontsera, etc., usually written otkonsera, is formed; by missionary influence, the latter, modified by the attributive -kæñ, 'bad', 'evil', 'wicked', 'ugly', is the common name for the Devil of Christian belief. The following are some of the forms of this term found in the Jesuit Relations (Thwaites ed.): ocki, okhi, oki, onkaqui (pl.), oqui, oski, otkis; and in Lafitau's Mœurs des Sauvages Ameriquains, 1724, okki and otkon occur. Preceded by an expression denoting 'verily' the term otkon is used as an expletive, or, perhaps, mild curse. (J. N. B. H.)

Otnaas-hadai (^sot náas xā'da-i, 'Eagle-house people'). A subdivision of the Yadus, a Haida family on the Eagle side, which was in turn a branch of the Stustas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Oto (from Wa'ota, 'lechers'). One of the three Sionan tribes forming the Chiwere group, the others being the Iowa and Missouri. The languages differ but slightly. The earliest reference to this tribe is found in the tradition which relates to the separation of the Chiwere group from the Winnebago. This tradition is given by Maximilian, who states that it was communicated to Maj. Bean, the Indian agent, by an old Oto chief. He related that, before the arrival of the whites a large band of Indians, the Hotonga ('fish-eaters'), who inhabited the lakes, migrated to the s. w. in pursuit of buffalo. At Green bay, Wis., they divided, the part called by the whites Winnebago remaining, while the rest continued the journey until they reached the Mississippi at the mouth of Iowa r., where they encamped on the sand beach and again divided, one band, the Iowa, concluding to remain there, and the rest continuing their travels reached the Missouri at the mouth of Grand r. These gave themselves the name of Neutache ('those that arrive at the mouth'), but were called Missouri by the whites. The two chiefs, on account of the seduction of the daughter of one by the son of the other, quarreled and separated one from the other. The division led by the father of the seducer became known as Wagh-tochtatta, or Oto, and moved farther up the Missouri. While the Winnebago settled in Wisconsin, the Iowa, after they ceded to the United States all the lands on which they first settled, moved w. between Missouri r. and the Little Platte. The Missouri, having been unfortunate in a war with the Osage, divided, and a part of them lived with the Iowa and a part with the Oto. The Oto continued up the Missouri until they crossed the Big Platte and lived for some time a short distance above its mouth; later they resided on Platte r., about 80 m. by water from the Missouri. The same tradition was obtained by Maj. Long several years before Maximilian's visit. Dorney was informed by the Iowa chiefs who visited Washington in 1883 that their people once formed part of the Winnebago. The Oto seem to have been most intimately associated with the Iowa. That they were ever at the mouth of Missouri r., where, according to one tradition, they were with the Missouri, is not likely. The fact that they were with the Iowa in the vicinity of Blue Earth r., Minn., immediately preceding Le Sueur's visit in 1700, indicates that their movement was across the Mississippi into s. Minnesota instead of down that stream. Le Sueur was informed by some Sioux whom he met that "this river was the country of the Sioux of the West, of the Ayavois [Iowa] and the Otocatas [Oto]." Messengers whom he sent to invite the Oto and Iowa to settle near his fort at the mouth of Blue Earth r. found that they had moved w. toward the Missouri r., near the Omaha. Marquette, in 1673, apparently locates the tribe on his autograph map on upper Des Moines or upper Iowa r. Membre (1680) places them 130 leagues from the Illinois, almost opposite the mouth of the Wisconsin. Iberville (1700) said that the Oto and Iowa were then with the Omaha between the Missouri and Mississippi rs., about 100 leagues from the Illinois. The last two statements agree substantially with that of Le Sueur. It is therefore not probable, as given in one statement, that the Oto were on Osage r. in 1687. That they were driven farther s. by the northern tribes at a later date will appear from the list of localities given below. Lahontan claims to have visited their village in 1690 on the "Otentas [Iowa or Des Moines] river at its junction with the Mississippi," perhaps referring to a temporary camp. In 1721, according to Charlevoix, the Oto were below the Iowa, who were on the e. side of Missouri r., and above the Kansa on the w. side. Le Page du Pratz (1758) mentions the Oto as a small nation on Missouri r. Jefferys (1761) placed them along the s. bank of "Panic river," probably the Platte between its mouth and the Pawnee country; but in another part of his work he locates them above the Kansa on the w. side of Missouri r. Lewis and Clark (1804) locate the tribe at the time of their expedition on the s. side of Platte r., about 80 m. from its mouth, but state that they formerly lived about 20 m. above the Platte, on the s. bank of the Missouri. Having diminished, probably through wars and smallpox, they migrated to the neighborhood of the Pawnee, under whose protection they lived, the Missouri being incorporated with them. From 1817 to 1841 they were on Platte r. near its mouth. In the latter year they consisted of 4 villages. In 1880 a part of the tribe removed to the lands of the Sauk and Fox Indians in Indian Ter., and in 1882 the remainder left their home in Nebraska and went to the same reservation.

The Oto tribe has never been important, their history being little more than an account of their struggles to defend themselves against their more powerful enemies, and of their migrations. That they were not noted for their military prowess, notwithstanding Long's statement of the deeds of bravery of some of their warriors, seems evident from their inability to cope with their enemies, although, according to Lewis and Clark, they were once "a powerful nation." They were cultivators of the soil, and it was on this account, and because they were said to be industrious, that Le Sueur wished them and the Iowa to settle near his fort. Lewis and Clark speak of those they saw, at or near Council Bluffs, as almost naked, having no covering except a sort of breechcloth, with a loose blanket or painted buffalo robe thrown over their shoulders. Their permanent villages consisted of large earthen lodges similar to those of the Kansa and Omaha; when traveling they found shelter in skin tipis. One of their musical instruments was a stick notched like a saw, over the teeth of which a smaller stick was rubbed forcibly backward and forward.

The Oto and Missouri made a treaty of peace with the United States, June 24, 1817. They joined with other tribes in the treaty of Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 15, 1830, by which were ceded all rights to lands E. of Missouri r. up to the mouth of Big Sioux r. By the treaties of Oto village, Nebr., Sept. 21, 1833; Bellevue, Nebr., Oct. 15, 1836; Washington, Mar. 15, 1854, and Nebraska City, Nebr., Dec. 9, 1854, they ceded to the United States all their lands except their reservation on Big Blue r., Nebr. Here they remained until about 1882, when, with the Missouri, they were removed to Indian Ter. and placed under the Ponca, Pawnee, Oto, and Oakland agency. Their reserve contained 129,113 acres.

Morgan gives the Oto and Missouri gentes together, as follows: Mejeraja (Wolf), Mooncha (Bear), Ahrowha (Cow Buffalo), Hooma (Elk), Khaa (Eagle), Luteja (Pigeon), Waka (Snake), Makotch (Owl). Dorsey obtained the following list of Oto gentes: Patha (Beaver), Tunanpi (Black Bear) or Munchirache, Arukhwa (Buffalo), Rukheha (Pigeon), Makache (Owl), Wakan (Snake), Cheghita (Eagle).

Lewis and Clark gave their number in 1805 as 500; Catlin, in 1833 (including the Missouri), as 1,200; Burrows, in 1849, 900; the Indian Report of 1843 (including the Missouri), as 931. In 1862 the two tribes numbered 708; in 1867, 511; in 1877, 457; in 1886, 334; in 1906, 390.

Otoacte. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Otocara. See Olotaraca.

Otocomanes. Mentioned with the Aita-comanes as a people occupying a province which had been visited by the Dutch, where gold and silver was abundant. The locality is not given, and the province is probably as imaginary as the expedition in connection with which it is mentioned. See Freytas, Exped. of Peña-loea (1662), Shea trans., 67, 1882.

Otontagan. An Ottawa band living before 1680 on Manitoulin id., L. Huron, Ontario, whence they were driven out by the Iroquois.

Otontagana.—Lahontan, New Voy., i, 93, 1708.

Otaouas of Talon.—Ibid.

Otopali. A village mentioned by Fontaneda, about 1575 (Memoir, Smith trans., 16, 1854), as reputed to be inland and northward from the coast province of Chicora (q. v.), which was about the present Charleston, S. C.

Otowi. An extensive prehistoric pueblo situated on a mesa about 5 m. w. of the point where the Rio Grande enters White Rock canyon, between the Rito de los Frijoles and Santa Clara canyon, in the s. e. corner of Sandoval co., N. Mex. The pueblo consisted of a cluster of five houses situated on sloping ground and all except one connected by a wall. They were terraced structures, each house group having from two to four stories, altogether containing about 450 rooms on the ground floor and probably 700 rooms in all. The settlement was provided with ten subterranean circular kivas, all except two detached from the walls of the dwellings. A reservoir was placed so as to receive the drainage from the village. According to the traditions of certain clans of the present Tewa of San Ildefonso, Otowi was the oldest village occupied by their ancestors. They hold in an indefinite way that prior to the building of Otowi their clans occupied small scattered houses on the adjacent mesas, and they claim that, owing to the failure of the mesa water supply, removal to the valley eventually became necessary, a detachment of the Otowi people founding Perage on the w. side of the Rio Grande about a mile w. of the present San Ildefonso. Associated with Otowi are numerous cliff-dwellings excavated in the soft volcanic walls of the adjacent canyons. These consist of two types: (1) open-front dwellings, usually single-chambered, in most cases natural caves enlarged and shaped artificially; (2) wholly artificial dwellings with closed fronts of the natural rock in situ, usually multi-chambered, with floors, always plastered, below the level of the entrances; crude fireplaces beside the doorway; rooms commonly rectangular and well-shaped. From about $\frac{1}{2}$ m.

to 1 m. above Otowi is a cluster of conical formations of white tufa, some 30 ft high; they are full of caves, both natural and artificial, some of which have been utilized as habitations. See Hewett (1) in Am. Anthropol., vi, 641, 1904; (2) Bull. 32, B. A. E., 1906.

Otreouati. See Grangula.

Otshpetl. The second Chilula village on Redwood cr., N. W. Cal.

Ot-teh-petl.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853 (Yurok name).

Otsinoghiyata ('The Sinew'). An old and prominent Onondaga chief, commonly called The Bunt, a man of strong yet genial character. Ziesberger first mentioned him, in 1752, as the principal chief, living in the upper town. He was called Ozinoghiyata in the Albany treaty of 1754, and was mentioned almost yearly afterward. In 1762 he was called chief sachem of Onondaga, and was at the Pontiac council at Oswego in 1766. He signed the Fort Stanwix treaty in Oct. 1768, and was at conferences at German Flats in 1770 and Onondaga in 1775. In 1774 he retired from the chieftaincy on account of his advanced age, and was succeeded by Onagogare. (W. M. B.)

Otsiquette, Peter. An Oneida chief who signed the treaty of 1788. He was a well educated man and had visited Lafayette in France, but returned to savage life. He was a member of the delegation of chiefs to Philadelphia in 1792, where he died and was buried with military honors. He is also called Peter Otzagert and Peter Jaquette. Elkanah Watson described him at the treaty of 1788. Peter Otsiequette, perhaps the same Indian, witnessed the Onondaga treaty of 1790. (W. M. B.)

Otskwirakeron ('a heap or collection of twigs'). A traditional Iroquois town of the Bear clan; so enumerated in the list of towns in the Chant of Welcome of the Condolence Council of the League of the Iroquois. Nothing definite is known of its situation or to what tribe it belonged. See Hale, Iroq. Book of Rites, 120, 1883. (J. N. B. H.)

Ottachugh. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the n. bank of Rappahannock r., in Lancaster co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Ottawa (from ādāwe, 'to trade', 'to buy and sell,' a term common to the Cree, Algonkin, Nipissing, Montagnais, Ottawa, and Chippewa, and applied to the Ottawa because in early traditional times and also during the historic period they were noted among their neighbors as intertribal traders and barterers, dealing chiefly in corn-meal, sunflower oil, furs and skins, rugs or mats, tobacco, and medicinal roots and herbs).

On French r., near its mouth, on Georgian bay, Champlain in 1615 met 300 men of a tribe which, he said, "we call les cheveux relevez." Of these he said that their arms consisted only of the bow and arrow, a buckler of boiled leather, and the club; that they wore no breech-clout, and that their bodies were much tattooed in many fashions and designs; that their faces were painted in diverse colors, their noses pierced, and their ears bordered with trinkets. The chief of this band gave Champlain to understand that they had come to that place to dry huckleberries to be used in winter when nothing else was available. In the following year Champlain left the Huron villages and visited the "Cheneux relevez" (Ottawa), living westward from the Hurons, and he said that they were very joyous at "seeing us again." This last expression seemingly shows that those whom he had met on French r. in the preceding year lived where he now visited them. He said that the Cheneux relevez waged war against the Mascoutens (here erroneously called by the Huron name Asistagueronon), dwelling 10 days' journey from them; he found this tribe populous; the majority of the men were great warriors, hunters, and fishermen, and were governed by many chiefs who ruled each in his own country or district; they planted corn and other things; they went into many regions 400 or 500 leagues away to trade; they made a kind of mat which served them for Turkish rugs; the women had their bodies covered, while those of the men were uncovered, saving a robe of fur like a mantle, which was worn in winter but usually discarded in summer; the women lived very well with their husbands; at the catamenial period the women retired into small lodges, where they had no company of men and where food and drink were brought to them. This people asked Champlain to aid them against their enemies on the shore of the fresh-water sea, distant 200 leagues from them.

In the Jesuit Relation for 1667, Father Le Mercier, reporting Father Allouez, treated the Ottawa, Kiskakon, and Ottawa Sinago as a single tribe, because they had the same language and together formed a common town. He adds that the Ottawa (Outaouacs) claimed that the great river (Ottawa?) belonged to them, and that no other nation might navigate it without their consent. It was, for this reason, he continues, that although very different in nationality all those who went to the French to trade bore the name Ottawa, under whose auspices the journey was undertaken. He adds that the ancient habitat of the Ottawa had been a quarter of L. Huron, whence the fear of the Iroquois drove them, and whither were borne all their longings, as it were, to their native country. Of the Ottawa the Father says: "They were little disposed toward the faith, for they were too much given to idolatry, superstitions, fables, polygamy, looseness of the marriage tie, and to all manner of license, which caused them to drop all native decency."

According to tradition (see Chippewa) the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Potawatomi tribes of the Algonquian family were formerly one people who came from some point N. of the great lakes and separated at Mackinaw, Mich. The Ottawa were located by the earliest writers and also by tradition on Manitoulin Id. and along the N. and S. shore of Georgian bay.

Father Dablon, superior of the missions of the Upper Algonkin in 1670, said: "We call these people Upper Algonkin to distinguish them from the Lower Algonkin who are lower down, in the vicinity of Tadoussac and Quebec. People commonly give them the name Ottawa, because, of more than 30 different tribes which are found in these countries, the first that descended to the French settlements were the Ottawa, whose name remained afterward attached to all the others." The Father adds that the Saulteurs, or Pahouitingach Irini, whose native country was at the Sault Sainte Marie, numbering 500 souls, had adopted three other tribes, making to them a cession of the rights of their own native country, and also that the people who were called Noquet ranged, for the purpose of hunting, along the S. side of L. Superior, whence they originally came; and the Chippewa (Outchibous) and the Marameg from the N. side of the same lake, which they regarded as their native land. The Ottawa were at Chagaouamigong or La Pointe de Sainte Esprit in 1670 (Jes. Rel. 1670, 83, 1858).

Father Le Mercier (Jes. Rel. 1654), speaking of a flotilla of canoes from the "upper nations," says that they were "partly Ondataouaouat, of the Algonquine language, whom we call 'les Cheveux relevez.'" And in the Relation for 1665 the same Father says of the Ottawa that they were better merchants than warriors.

In a letter of 1723, Father Sébastien Rasles says that he learned while among the Ottawa that they attributed to themselves an origin as senseless as it was ridiculous. They informed him that they were derived from three families, each composed of 500 persons. The first was that of Michabou (see Nanabozho), or the Great Hare, representing him to be a gigantic man who laid nets in 18 fathoms of water which reached only to his armpits and who was born in the island of Michilimackinac, and formed the earth and invented fish-nets after carefully watching a spider weaving its web for taking flies; among other things he decreed that his descendants should burn their dead and scatter their ashes in the air, for if they failed to do this, the snow would cover the ground continuously and the lakes would remain frozen. The second family was that of the Namepich, or Carp, which, having spawned its eggs on the shore of a river and the sun casting its rays on them, a woman was thus formed from whom they claimed descent. The third family was that of the Bear's paw, but no explanation was given of the manner in which its genesis took place. But when a bear was killed a feast of its own flesh was given in its honor and an address was made to it in these terms: "Have thou no thoughts against us, because we have killed thee; thou hast sense and courage; thou seest that our children are suffering from hunger; they love thee, and so wish to cause thee to enter their bodies; and is it not a glorious thing to be eaten by the children of captains?" The first two families bury their dead (Lettres Edif., iv, 106, 1819).

It has been stated by Charlevoix and others that when they first became known to the French they lived on Ottawa r. This, however, is an error, due to the twofold use of the name, the one generic and the other specific, as is evident from the statements by Champlain and the Jesuit Relations (see Shea in Charlevoix, New France, ii, 270, 1866); this early home was n. and w. of the Huron territory. No doubt Ottawa r., which they frequently visited and were among the first western tribes to navigate in trading expeditions to the French settlements, was named from the Ottawa generically so called, not from the specific people named Ottawa. There is unquestioned documentary evidence that as early as 1635 a portion of the Ottawa lived on Manitoulin id. Father Vimont, in the Jesuit Relation for 1640, 34, 1858, says that "south of the Amikwa [Beaver Nation] there is an island [Manitoulin] in that fresh water sea [L. Huron], about 30 leagues in length, inhabited by the Outaouan [Ottawa], who are a people come from the nation of the Standing Hair [Cheveux Relevez]." This information he received from Nicolet, who visited the Ottawa there in 1635. On the DuCreux map of 1660, on a large island approximating the location of Manitoulin id., the "natio surrectorum capillorum," i. e. the Cheveux Releves, or Ottawa, is placed. They were allies and firm friends of the French and the Hurons, and conducted an active trade between the western tribes and the French. After the destruction of the Hurons, in 1648-49, the Iroquois turned their arms against the Ottawa, who fled with a remnant of the Hurons to the islands at the entrance of Green bay, where the Potawatomi, who had preceded the Ottawa and settled on these islands, received the fugitives with open arms and granted them a home. However, their residence here was but temporary, as they moved westward a few years afterward, a part going to Keweenaw bay, where they were found in 1660 by Father Menard, while another part fled with a band of Hurons to the Mississippi, and settled on an island near the entrance of L. Pepin. Driven away by the Sioux, whom they had unwisely attacked, they moved n. to Black r., Wis., at the head of which the Hurons built a fort, while the Ottawa pushed eastward and settled on the shore of Chaquamegon bay. They were soon followed by the missionaries, who established among them the mission of St Esprit. Harassed by the Sioux, and a promise of protection by the French having been obtained, they returned in 1670-71 to Manitoulin id. in L. Huron. According to the records, Father Allouez, in 1668-69, succeeded in converting the Kiskakon band at Chaquamegon, but the Sinago and Keinouche remained deaf to his appeals. On their return to Manitoulin the French fathers established among them the mission of St Simon. There is a tradition that Lac Court Oreilles was formerly called Ottawa lake because a band of the Ottawa dwelt on its shores, until they were forced to move by the attacks of the Sioux (Brunson in Wis. Hist. Coll., iv). Their stay on Manitoulin id. was brief; by 1680 most of them had joined the Hurons at Mackinaw, about the station established by Marquette in 1671.

The two tribes lived together until about 1700, when the Hurons removed to the vicinity of Detroit, while a portion of the Ottawa about this time seems to have obtained a foothold on the w. shore of L. Huron between Saginaw bay and Detroit, where the Potawatomi were probably in close union with them. Four divisions of the tribe were represented by a deputy at the treaty signed at Montreal in 1700. The band which had moved to the s. e. part of the lower Michigan peninsula returned to Mackinaw about 1706. Soon afterward the chief seat of a portion of the tribe was fixed at Waganakisi L'Arbre Croche, near the lower end of L. Michigan. From this point they spread in every direction, the majority settling along the e. shore of the lake, as far s. as St Joseph r., while a few found their way into s. Wisconsin and s. e. Illinois. In the n. they shared Manitoulin id. and the n. shore of L. Huron with the Chippewa, and in the s. e. their villages alternated with those of their old allies the Hurons, now called Wyandot, along the shore of L. Erie from Detroit to the vicinity of Beaver cr. in Pennsylvania. They took an active part in all the Indian wars of that region up to the close of the War of 1812. The celebrated chief Pontiac was a member of this tribe, and Pontiac's war of 1763, waged chiefly around Detroit, is a prominent event in their history. A small part of the tribe which refused to submit to the authority of the United States removed to Canada, and together with some Chippewa and Potawatomi, is now settled on Walpole id. in L. St Clair. The other Ottawa in Canadian territory are on Manitoulin and Cockburn ids. and the adjacent shore of L. Huron.

All the Ottawa lands along the w. shore of L. Michigan were ceded by various treaties, ending with the Chicago treaty of Sept. 26, 1833, wherein they agreed to remove to lands granted them on Missouri r. in the s. e. corner of Kansas. Other bands, known as the Ottawa of Blanchard's fork of Great Auglaize r., and of Roche de Boeuf on Maumee r., resided in Ohio, but these removed w. of the Mississippi about 1832 and are now living in Oklahoma. The great body, however, remained in the lower peninsula of Michigan, where they are still found scattered in a number of small villages and settlements.

In his Histoire du Canada (t. 190, 1836), Fr Sagard mentions a people whom he calls "la nation du bois." He met two canoe loads of these Indians in a village of the Nipissing, describing them as belonging to a very distant inland tribe, dwelling he thought toward the "sea of the south," which was probably L. Ontario. He says that they were dependents of the Ottawa (Chenoux Belezzi) and formed with them as it were a single tribe. The men were entirely naked, at which the Hurons, he says, were apparently greatly shocked, although scarcely less indecent themselves. Their faces were gaily painted in many colors in grease, some with one side in green and the other in red; others seemed to have the face covered with a natural lace, perfectly well-made, and others in still different styles. He says the Hurons had not the pretty work nor the invention of the many small toys and trinkets which this "Gens de Bois" had. This tribe has not yet been definitely identified, but it may have been one of the three tribes mentioned by Sagard in his Journal de la Langue Huronne, under the rubric "nations," as dependents of the Ottawa: Andahouat, namely, the Chierhonon, Squierhonon, and Hoindarhonon.

Charlevoix says the Ottawa were one of the rudest nations of Canada, cruel and barbarous to an unusual degree and sometimes guilty of cannibalism. Baquerville de la Potherie (Hist. Am. Sept., 1753) says they were formerly very rude, but by intercourse with the Hurons they have become more intelligent, imitating their valor, making themselves formidable to all the tribes with whom they were at enmity and respected by those with whom they were in alliance. It was said of them in 1859: "This people is still advancing in agricultural pursuits; they may be said to have entirely abandoned the chase; all of them live in good, comfortable log cabins; have fields inclosed with rail fences, and own domestic animals." The Ottawa were expert canoe-men; as a means of defense they sometimes built forts, probably similar to those of the Hurons.

In the latter part of the 17th century the tribe consisted of 4, possibly 5, divisions. It is repeatedly stated that there were 4 bands, and no greater number is ever mentioned, yet 5 names are given, as follows: Kiskakon, Sinago, Keinouche, Nassauaketon, and Sable. La Mothe Cadillac says there were 4 bands: Kiskakon, Sinago, Sable, and Nassauaketon. Verwyst, Miss. Labors, 210, 1886. Outaoutiboy, chief of the Ottawa, speaking at the conference with Gov. de Callières, Sept. 3, 1700, said: "I speak in the name of the four Outaouais nations, to wit: The Outaouais of the Sable, the Outaouais Sinago, the Kiskakons, and the people of the Fork" (Nassauaketon). In addition to these chief divisions there were minor local bands, as Blanchard's Fork, Kajienatroene, Maskasinik, Neraouichiriniquek, Nisak, Ommunise, Otonagan, Talon, and Thunder Bay. Chauvignerie in 1736 distinguished the Ottawa of Grand River, L. Nipissing, Michilimackinac, Detroit, and Saginaw. According to Morgan the names of the Ottawa gentes are unknown, but Chauvignerie in 1736 mentioned the bear, otter, gray squirrel, and black squirrel as the totems of different bands of the tribe. According to Charlevoix the Ottawa signed with a hare the provisional treaty concluded at Montreal in 1700. At the great conference on the Maumee in 1793 they signed with the otter totem. In Tanner's Narrative is given a list of 18 totems among the Ottawa and Chippewa, but there is nothing to indicate which are Ottawa and which Chippewa.

The Ottawa entered into numerous treaties with the United States, as follows: Ft McIntosh, Jan. 21, 1785; Ft Har-mar, Ohio, Jan. 9, 1789; Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795; Ft Industry, July 4, 1805; Detroit, Mich., Nov. 17, 1807; Brownstown, Mich., Nov. 25, 1808; Greenville, Ohio, July 22, 1814; Spring Wells, Mich., Sept. 8, 1815; St Louis, Mo., Aug. 24, 1816; on the Miami, Ohio, Sept. 29, 1817; St Mary's, Ohio, Sept. 17, 1818; L'Arbre Croche and Michilimackinac, Mich., July 6, 1820; Chicago, Ill., Aug. 29, 1821; Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825; Green Bay, Wis., Aug. 25, 1828; Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 29, 1829; Miami Bay, Ohio, Aug. 30, 1831; Maumee, Ohio, Feb. 18, 1833; Chicago, Ill., Sept. 26, 1833; Washington, D. C., Mar. 28, 1836; Council Bluffs, Iowa, June 5 and 17, 1846; Detroit, Mich., July 31, 1855, and Washington, D. C., June 24, 1862.

The population of the different Ottawa groups is not known with certainty. In 1906 the Chippewa and Ottawa on Manitoulin and Cockburn ids., Canada, were 1,497, of whom about half were Ottawa; there were 197 Ottawa under the Seneca School, Okla., and in Michigan 5,587 scattered Chippewa and Ottawa in 1900, of whom about two-thirds are Ottawa. The total is therefore about 4,700.

The following are or were Ottawa villages: Aegakotcheising, Anamiewatigong, Apontigoumy, Machonee, Manistee, Menawzhetaunaung, Meshkemau, Michilimackinac, Middle Village, Obidgewong (mixed), Oquanoxa, Roche de Bréuf, Saint Simon (mission), Shabawywyagun, Tushquegan, Waganakisi, Walpole Island, Wangau, Wolf Rapids.

Otusson (probably from utasin, ‘bench’ or ‘platform’ in the lodge.—W. J.) A former Chippewa village, taking its name from a chief, on upper Huron r. in Sanilac co., Mich., on a reserve sold in 1837.

kenne and the Tselone on the w. side of the Rocky mts., Brit. Col.

Otzen-ne.—Morice in Trans. Can. Inst., 29, 1893.

Onabanghires. One of several towns situated close together, apparently on Ohio r. c.: one of its tributaries, on Marquette's map of 1673 as given by Theve-not (but not on the true map as given by Shea, Discov. and Expl. Miss. Val., 1852). It is possible that the name refers to the Ouabano; but the way in which these towns are located on the map shows that their situation is mere guess-work.

Ouabano (Algonquian: ‘eastern’; cf. ahnaki).
An unidentified tribe or band, probably Algonquian, encountered by La Salle in 1683. They traded with the Spaniards, and at La Salle's solicitation visited Fort St Louis on Illinois r. in company with the Shawnee and Chaskpe.
They appear to have come from the S.

Ouachita. A former tribe, apparently Caddoan, residing on Black or Ouachita
r., in N. E. Louisiana. Bienville in 1700 encountered some of them carrying salt to the Taensa, with whom he says they were intending to live. Later he reached the main Ouachita village, which he found to comprise about 5 houses and to contain about 70 men. It would seem that the tribe subsequently retired before the Chickasaw and settled among the Natchitoch, their identity being soon afterward lost. They are not to be confounded with the Wichita. (J. R. S.)

1900. Wouachita.—Ann. de la Prop. de la Foi, ii, 384, ca. 1825.

Ouadaougeounaton. Mentioned by Alcedo (Dic. Geog., III, 416, 1788) as an Indian settlement of Louisiana, "in the territory of the Sioux of the west." The name is possibly a synonym of Wea.

Ouade. A village in Georgia, about 1564, near the coast, apparently on or near lower Altamaha r. De Bry (Brev. Narr., II, map, 1591) locates it on the coast of South Carolina, s. of Ft St Helena. The name may be a dialectic form of Guale, q. v.

Oualeanicon. A tribe mentioned by Coxe (Carolana, 48, 1741), in connection with the Foxes and Menominee, as living on Wisconsin r., Wis. The word may be a corrupted form of Iliniouec (Illinois) or may possibly refer to the Winnebago.

Oualuck's Band (Ou-a-luck). The local name of a Snake band formerly in Eureka valley, E. Oreg.—Drew in Ind. Aff. Rep., 59, 1863.

Ouanakina. Mentioned by Smith (Bouquet's Exped., 70, 1766) as a tribe probably associated with the Creeks and numbering 300. Schoolcraft includes them under the heading "Upper, Middle, and Lower Creeks." It is possible that they are identical with the Wewoka (q. v.) who lived on Wenoka cr., Elmore co., Ala. (C. T.)

Ouanikina.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 128, 1816.

Ouanikina.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 557, 1853.

Ouananiche. A species of salmon (Salmo salar ouananiche) found in the waters of E. Quebec and part of Labrador. Chambers (The Ouananiche, 50, 1896) cites 26 different spellings, literary and popular, French Canadian and English, including wananish, ouininiche, wininish, and winmis, all of them corruptions of the French Canadian ouananiche, which form appears in the documents of the old Jesuit missionaries. An English winanis dates back to the first decade of the 19th century; awenanish is used by Bouchette somewhat later. The source of the word is wananish in the Montagnais dialect of Algonquian, which seems to be a diminutive in -ish of wanans or awanans, one of the words for salmon in the older language. Dr Wm. Jones suggests a cognate form of the Chippewa winiñish, 'unpleasant fat' (ish referring to unpleasantness), and says the same language has winiñat (animate), 'is unclean.' (A. F. C.)

Ouapou. A tribe mentioned by La Salle in 1680 (Margry, Déc., II, 60, 1877) as living in lower Michigan. Probably Pones, or Pour, i. e. Potawatomi, with the demonstrative prefix ona. (J. M.)

Ouasouarini (probably for Awasiwiniñiwug, 'people of the Bullhead clan.'—W. J.). A Chippewa tribe living in 1640 on Georgian bay, Ontario, n. of the Hurons (Jes. Rel. 1640, 34, 1858). They are probably identical with the Ouassi, found in the vicinity of Nipigon r. in 1736; also with the Ouasaouanik, spoken of in 1658 as a well-known tribe living near the Sault Ste Marie. The Ouassi were found by J. Long in 1791, mixed with other Chippewa, on the n. shore of L. Superior, almost exactly in the locality assigned them by Dobbs in 1744. Chauvignerie estimated their number in 1736 at about 300 souls, and stated that the catfish (bullhead) was their totem, which was also the totem of the Awausee (q. v.), one of the Chippewa bands at Sault Ste Marie.

Ouacé.—Chauvignerie (1736) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 1054, 1855. Ouali.—Chauvignerie (1736) quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 556, 1853 (misprint).

Ouasaouanik.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 22, 1858. Ouasouarim.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 34, 1888. Ouassi.—Dobbs, Hudson Bay, 32, 1744. Wasawani.—Jes. Rel., III, index, 1858. Wasses.—Long, Voy. and Trav., 45, 1791.

Ouenrio. A Huron village, situated, according to the Jesuit Relation for 1635, about 1 league from Ossossané. Father Jones (Jes. Rel., xxxiv, 255, 1898) places it in Tiny tp., about 3 m. n. e. of La Fontaine, Ontario. Its people had previously been a part of those of Toanche and Ihonattiria. In 1635 three feasts were held here to satisfy a dream, the description of the accompanying ceremonies giving a fair idea of such performances (Jes. Rel., x, 201, 1897). In 1637 an epidemic caused great distress to the inhabitants of Ouenrio, carrying off many and creating a desire to have the Jesuit missionaries dwell among them. In his Relation for 1635 Le Jeune says their cabins were better than the hovels of the Montagnais and were constructed like bowers, or garden arbors, of which, instead of branches and grass, some were covered with cedar bark, others with broad strips of ash, elm, fir, or spruce bark; and although those of cedar were regarded as best, they were very inflammable, wherefore so many similar villages had been burned. (J. N. B. H.)

Oueschekgagamionilimy (possibly for Ushashā'tagamiwiniñiwug, 'people of the ridge'). The Caribou gens of the Chippewa of Rainy r., Minn. St Pierre in 1753 (Margry, Déc., VI, 649, 1886) spoke of them as near Rainy lake, Ontario. (W. J.)

Oughetgeodatons ('dung village'). A village or subdivision of one of the western Sioux bands.

Ouidachenaton.—Jefferys (1763), Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. Oughetgechaton.—De l'Isle, map of La. (1700), in Neill, Hist. Minn., 164, 1858. Oughetgéodatons.—Le Sueur (1700) in Margry, Déc., VI, 87, 1887. Oughetgeodatons.—Le Sueur (1700) in Neill, Hist. Minn., 170, 1858. Ouidachenaton.—De l'Isle, op. cit. Ouidaougeounaton.—Jefferys, op. cit. Ouidaougeoumaton.—De la Tour, map, 1779 (misprint of m for n). Ouidaougeounaton.—Carte des Pons. Angl., 1777. Ouidaougeounaton.—De l'Isle, op. cit.

Ouheywichkingh. An Algonquian village on Long id., N. Y., probably near the western end.—Doc. of 1645 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xiv, 60, 1883.

Ouiatenon (abbr. of wawiatanong, 'at wawiatan,' i. e. 'the current goes round': whence the name of the Wea tribe.—Gerard). The principal village of the Wea, situated on the s. e. bank of the Wabash, just below the mouth of Wea cr., in what is now Tippecanoe co., Ind. It was headquarters for the French traders in that section, the French Ft Ouiatenon having been nearly opposite the mouth of the creek. It is described as extending 3 m., though the number of houses it contained was but 70, exclusive of the French dwellings. In 1777 this was the principal Indian center on the Wabash, Ouiatenon and a Kickapoo town on the opposite side of the river together containing 1,000 fighting men. It was destroyed by the United States troops under Gen. Scott in 1791. For forms of the name, see Wea. (J. M. J. P. D.)

Ouikaliny (misprint of Onikaliny). A tribe n. of L. Superior in 1697, who sometimes traded with the French, but generally with the English on Hudson bay. They may have been the Maskegon.

Gens de l'Outarde.—La Chesnaye (1697) in Margry, Déc., vi, 7, 1886. Ouikaliny.—Ibid., 7.

Ouinebigonhelini (probably for Wini-bigowininiwug, 'people of the unpleasant water.'—W. J.). A tribe or band, doubtless of the Maskegon, living on Hudson bay at the mouth of Nelson r. in the middle of the 18th century.

Ouinebagonhelinis.—Dobbs, Hudson Bay, 24, 1744.

Ouinebigonhelini.—Ibid., 23.

Ouininiche. See Ouananiche.

Oujatespouitons. A band of one of the Dakota tribes w. of Mississippi at the close of the 17th century.

Oujalespious.—La Harpe (1700) in French, Hist. Coll. La., iii, 27, 1851. Oujalespouitons.—Le Sueur (1700) in Neill, Hist. Minn., 170, 1858 (sig.: 'village divided into many small bands'). Oujalespouitons.—Le Sueur quoted by Shea, Early Voyages, 104, 1861. Oujatespouitons.—Shea, ibid., 111 (sig.: 'village dispersed in several little bands'). Oujatespouitons.—Le Sueur (1700) in Margry, Déc., vi, 80, 1886. Oujatespony.—Pénicaut in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., ii, pt. 2, 6, 1864.

Oukesestigouek (Cree: ukisistigwek, 'swift-water people.'—Gerard). A Montagnais tribe or band, known to the French as early as 1643. They lived about the headwaters of Manicouagan r., n. of the Papinachois, with whom they appear to have been in close relation. They are spoken of as a quiet and peaceable people, willingly receiving instructions from the missionaries. (J. M.)

Ochessigirinioek.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 526, 1878. Ochessigirinioek.—Albanet (ca. 1670) quoted by Hind, Lab. Penin., ii, 22, 1863. Ochestgouetch.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 526, 1878. Ochestgouetch.—Hind, Lab. Penin., ii, 20, 1863. Ochestgouetcks.—Crepv, Map, ca. 1755. Ochessigirinioek.—Jes. Rel. 1670, 13, 1858. Ochestigouek.—Jes. Rel. 1665, 5, 1858. Ochestigouetck.—Jes. Rel. 1664, 13, 1858. Ochestigouets.—Bellin, Map, 1765. Oukesestigouek.—Jes. Rel. 1643, 38, 1858.

Oukiskimanitouk (probably for Okiskimanisiwog, 'whetstone-bird people', i. e. 'kingfisher people'). A clan of the Chippewa of L. Superior. Chauvignerie in 1736 noted the Oskemanettigons, an Algonquian tribe of 40 warriors on Winnipeg r., having the fisher as its totem. This may be identical.

Oskemanettigons.—Chauvignerie (1736) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 1054, 1855. Oskemanitigous.—Chauvignerie (1736) quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 556, 1853. Oukiskimanitouk.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 22, 1858. Oukiskimanitigog.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906.

Oukotoemi. A Montagnais band, part of whom gathered at Three Rivers, Quebec, in 1641 (Jes. Rel. 1641, 29, 1858). Doubtless a part of the Attikamegue.

Oumamiwek (Montagnais: umámiwek, 'down-stream people.'—Gerard). A tribe or band of Montagnais, closely related to, if not identical with, the Bersiamite. It is possible that the two were members of one tribe, each having its distinct organization. Shea (Charlevoix, New France, ii, 243, 1866), following the Jesuit Relations, says the Bersiamite were next to Tadoussac and the Oumamiwek inland in the n. e. The Relation of 1670 places them below the Papinachois on the St Lawrence. It is, however, certain that the Papinachois were chiefly inland, probably about the headwaters of Bersiamite r. From a conversation with an Oumamiwek chief recorded by Father Henri Nouvel (Jes. Rel. 1664) it is learned that his people and other tribes of the lower St Lawrence were in the habit at that early day of visiting the Hudson Bay region. The people of this tribe were readily brought under the influence of the missionaries.

Oumamiois.—Jes. Rel. 1670, 13, 1858. Smamisk.—Jes. Rel. 1650, 41, 1858. Smamiskhi.—Jes. Rel. 1641, 57, 1858. Oumamiwek.—Bailloquet (1661) in Hind, Lab. Penin., ii, 20, 1863. Oumanioeta.—Homann Heirs map, 1756 (located about head of Saguenay r., and possibly a distinct tribe). Oumanois.—Hind, Lab. Penin., ii, 21, 1863 (perhaps quoting a writer of 1664). Ouramanichek.—Jes. Rel. 1644, 53, 1858 (identical?).

Oumatachi. An Algonquian band living between Mistassini and Abittibi lakes, Quebec, in the 18th century.

Ounnashattakau. A Seneca chief, usually called Ounneashataikau, or Tall Chief, born in 1750. He signed the treaties of 1797 and Aug. 31, 1826, his name appearing as Auashodakai in the latter. He lived alternately at Squakie hill (Dayoitgao), near Mt Morris, N. Y., and at the latter place. He died and was buried at Tonawanda in 1828, but his remains were removed, June 11, 1884, to Mt Morris, where a monument bearing his name in the form A-wa-nis-ha-dek-ha (meaning 'burning day') has been erected to his memory. He is described as having been a graceful and fine-looking man. (W. M. B.)

Ounontisaston ('at the foot of the mountain.'—Hewitt). An important Huron village visited by De la Roche Dallion in 1626 (Shea, Cath. Miss., 170, 1855) and mentioned by Sagard (Can., III, 806, 1896) in 1636. Its location is uncertain, but it was probably not far from Niagara r., and the name may refer to its situation on the ridge facing the N. (W. M. B.)

Ouray (said by Powell to be the Ute attempt to pronounce the name Willie, given him by the white family to which he was attached as a boy; other authorities give the meaning 'The Arrow'). A chief of the Uncompahgre Ute, born in Colorado in 1820. He was engaged in a fierce struggle with the Sioux in his early manhood, and his only son was captured by his enemies, never to be restored. His relations with the United States government, so far as recorded, began with the treaty made by the Tabeguache band at Conejos, Colo., Oct. 7, 1863, to which his name is signed "U-ray, or Arrow." He also signed the treaty of Washington, Mar. 2, 1868, by the name U-re; though to the amendment, Aug. 15, 1868, it is written Ou-ray. He is noted chiefly for his unwavering friendship for the whites, with whom he always kept faith and whose interests he protected as far as possible, even on trying occasions. It was in all probability his firm stand and the restraint he imposed upon his people that prevented the spread of the outbreak of the Ute in Sept. 1879, when agent N. C. Meeker and others were killed and the women of the agency made captives.

As soon as Ouray heard of this outbreak he commanded the cessation of hostilities, which the agent claimed would have stopped further outrage had the soldiers been withheld. Ouray at this time signed himself as "head chief" of the Ute, though what this designation implied is uncertain. For his efforts to maintain peace at this time he was granted an annuity of $1,000 as long as he remained chief of the Ute. Ouray had a fair education, speaking both English and Spanish. His death occurred Aug. 24, 1880, at which time he was residing in a comfortable, well-furnished house on a farm which he owned and cultivated. (C. T.)

Oyers.—Richebourg in French, Hist. Coll. La., III, 248, 1851. Ousagououla.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., IV, 179, 1880. Walnut Village.—Gayarré, La., I, 156, 1851.

Ousint. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Outacity. Given in documents as the name or title of a prominent Cherokee chief about 1720; also spelled Otacite, Otassite, Outassatah, Wootassite, Wroos-tasatow.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 529, 546, 1900.

Outaouakamigouk (probably for Uāwā-kāmīguk, 'people of the open country or land.'—Gerard). A tribe or band on the N. E. coast of L. Huron in 1648; probably a part of the Ottawa.

Outaouakmikeug.—Jes. Rel. 1654, 22, 1858. Outaouakamigouk.—Jes. Rel. 1648, 62, 1858.

Outassatah.—See Outacity.

Outaunink (corrupted spelling of Uenink, from uten, or utān, 'town,' + ink, 'at.'—Gerard). A former Munsee village, commonly called Old Town, situated on the N. bank of White r., opposite Muncie, Delaware co., Ind., on land sold in 1818. The Indians have called the place "site of the town," or "place where the town was," and whites have mistaken this for the name of the town when it was there. (J. P. D.)

Old Town.—J. P. Dunn, infn. 1907. Outaunink.—Hough, map, in Indiana Geol. Rep., 1882.

Outchichagami (Montagnais: Uchikā-gāmi, 'people near the water.'—Gerard). The name of a small tribe living N. of Albany r., in Keewatin, Canada. They speak a Chippewa dialect fairly well understood by the Chippewa of the N. shore of L. Superior. (W. J.)

Otelitā-kōnsag Wm. Jones, infn. 1906. Outchichagami.—Jeffreys, French Dom. Am., I, map, 1761. Outchichagamiouets.—La Tour Map, 1779.

Outchongai. A band that lived in 1640 on the E. side of Georgian bay, Ontario r., and probably S. of French r. They were connected with the Amikwa. In 1736 they were living at Oka, Quebec, and were described by Chauvignerie as a clan of the Nipissing, with the heron as their totem. Ashagud.—Chauvignerie (1786) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 1053, 1855. Ashagus.—Chauvignerie (1786) quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 664, 1853. Atahongueta.—Jes. Rel. 1648, 61, 1858. Atahongok.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 22, 1858. Atahonghe.—Jes. Rel. 1648, 62, 1858. Atahongueta.—Jes. Rel., iii, index, 1858. Outahongal.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 34, 1858. Outahongueta.—Jes. Rel., iii, index, 1858.

Outimagami (Nipissing: 'deep-water people'). An unidentified Algonquian tribe or band formerly living s. of L. Nipissing, toward Hudson bay (Jes. Rel. 1640, 34, 1858). The name appears to be identical with that of L. Temagami. (A. F. C.)

Otaribi uturibi, 'turibi [Coregonus artedii, a congener of the white-fish] people.'—(Gerard). A former Algonquian tribe or band in Ontario, living s. of L. Nipissing and wandering to the region of Hudson bay.

Otaulabia.—Macquerville de la Potherie, Hist. Am., ii, 49, 1753. Otaulabysa.—Du Lhut (1684) in Margry, Dec., vi, 51, 1885. Otaribi.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 34, 1858.

Ouworage (Iroquois name). One of the 5 Abnaki villages in 1700.—Bellomont (1700) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 758, 1854.

Ovens. The pit oven, consisting of a hole excavated in the ground, heated with fire, and then filled with food which was covered over and allowed to cook, was general in America, though as a rule it was employed only occasionally, and principally for cooking vegetal substances. This method of cooking was found necessary to render acrid or poisonous foods harmless and starchy foods saccharine, and as a preliminary in drying and preserving food for winter use. Rude camp devices, such as baking in a cavity in the ashes, sometimes incasing in clay the substance to be cooked, were in common use; simple pit ovens, charged according to a definite plan, and ovens with a draft hole, the latter occurring among the Pueblos, comprise the varieties of this invention in northern America.

The Taculli cook roots in a pit oven, placing a layer of heated stones in the bottom, then a layer of food, and finally a covering of earth. Powers says the Pomo extract the toxic principle from buckeyes by steaming them underground for two or three days; they first excavate a large hole, pack it watertight around the sides, burn a fire therein for a space of time, then put in the buckeyes with water and heated stones, and cover the whole with a layer of earth. The Hupa, Maidu, Yurok, and perhaps most of the acorn-consuming Indians of California, cooked acorn mush in small sand pits, and the Tlelding made soap-root (Chlorogalum pomeridianum) palatable by cooking it in an earth-covered heap. The Hupa cook the same plant for about two days in a large pit, lined with stones, in which a hot fire is maintained until the stones and surrounding earth are well heated; the fire is then drawn, the pit lined with leaves of wild grape and wood sorrel to improve the flavor of the bulbs, and a quantity of the bulbs thrown in; leaves are then placed on top, the whole is covered with earth, and a big fire built on top (Goddard). The Indians of British Columbia, including Vancouver id., roasted clams in a pit oven, in much the same way as the New England Indians followed in the well-known "clambake" early adopted by the whites. Wherever camas (q. v.) is found, the Indians roasted it in pits. A cavity is made in the ground large enough to hold 10 to 20 bushels, and lined with pebbles; the pit is then filled in order with roots, pebbles, and grass, upon which is formed a hearth of wet clay, over which a fire is kept up for about seventy hours; if the fire burns through the hearth, which is indicated by steam rising through the camas, the oven is again covered with clay (Gibbs).

Speaking of the Powhatan Indians, Capt. John Smith says: "The chief root they have for food is called Tockawhough. It groweth like a flagge in Marishes. In one day a Salvage will gather sufficient for a weeke. These roots are much of the greatnesse and taste of Potatoes. They use to cover a great many of them with Oke leaves and Ferne, and then cover all with earth in the manner of a Cole-pit; over it, on each side, they continue a great fire 24 houres before they dare eat it. Raw it is no better then poyson, and being roasted, except it be tender and the heat abated, or sliced and dried in the Sunne, mixed with sorrell and meale or such like, it will prickle and torment the throat extremely, and yet in summer they use this ordinarily for bread."

The Panamint Indians of California roasted cactus joints in pits, also mesquit, and the Paiute and Shoshone cooked poison root (tobacco root) in the same way (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, vi, 697, 1857; Maximilian, Trav., 252, 1843); the Kutchin cooked roots in the same fashion, and even the Alaskan Eskimo roasted roots of the wild parsnip in underground ovens. Some tribes, as the Pawnee, Karankawa, and Sioux, simply roasted small portions of corn and meat in ashes; and the Yuma, Zuni, and others encase a dead rat or a rabbit in clay and then put the ball in the fire until the meat is roasted.

The Pueblos carried the art of cooking in pit ovens much farther than any other Indians. They had large community ovens consisting of a bottle-shaped cavity excavated in the ground and provided with a draft-hole; in these great quantities of green corn ears are roasted. Similar ovens, 12 to 15 ft in diameter, found among the ancient ruins of the Salt River valley in Arizona, show the effect of great heat; the Apache employ such ovens for roasting maguey. Small family ovens with draft hole, and others consisting merely of a jar set in the ground and covered with a stone, are still used by the Hopi. These are heated with a fire of twigs; a jar of mush is set in them, the orifice of the oven covered with a stone luted down with clay, and a fire built over the top and kept burning for about 12 hours. The Zuni had such ovens lined with stone slabs but without draft hole, and also a pit oven in which mush was baked between slabs of heated stones. The dome-shape ovens of stone plastered with clay are in common use among the Pueblos (except the Hopi), and the Mexicans of the Southwest, but this form of cooking apparatus was introduced from Spain by way of Mexico. Some of the Pueblos had an oven cult, in Zuni represented by the demon inspector of ovens. See Food.

Owhyhee. Mentioned by Ross (Fur Hunters, i, 83, 130, 1855), with Iroquois and Abnaki, as if the name of an Indian tribe, members of which formed a party of voyageurs on Columbia r., Oregon. The name however, is simply an early form of Hawaii, Kanakas having made their influence felt on the N. W. coast in the early half of the 19th century and later. The name, spelled Owyhee, survives as that of a river in Nevada, Oregon, and Idaho, and a range of mountains, a county, and a postoffice in the state last mentioned. See Hawaiian influence.

Owiyekumi (Ow'-i-yē-kumī). The principal town of the Quatsino on Forward inlet, Quatsino sd., n. w. coast of Vancouver id.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1887, sec. ii, 65, 1888.

Owl's Town. A former village, probably of the Delawares, on Mohican r. in Coshocton co., Ohio.—Hutchins map in Smith, Bouquet's Exped., 1766.

Oxidoddy. An Indian name, of uncertain origin, preserved by herbalists and "herb doctors" for black-root, Culver's-root, or Culver's-physic, Veronica virginica. (W. R. G.)

Oyak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the e. shore of Kuskokwim bay, Alaska, just n. of the mouth of Kanektok r.

Oyagamut.—Spurr and Post quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Oyaron (o-i-ä'-ron'). The common Iroquois name of the personal, and sometimes the gentile and tribal, tutelary, guardian genius, or guiding spirit believed to protect and watch over the destiny and welfare of every person or kindred.

The doctrines connected with the concept of the oyaron lie at the base of the activities comprehended under the rubric totemism, the key to which is the idea of guardianship or voluntary protection, based on the concept of primitive man that the earth and all that it contains was brought into being by the primal beings of his cosmogony solely for the welfare and glory of man, and that therefore these owed to him the duty of voluntarily making provision for his welfare. It was a dogma of this early philosophy that the oyaron was revealed or manifested itself to the subject in a vision or dream, either before or after birth. After birth it could be ceremonially acquired in the following general manner: At the age of puberty, the boy under the tutorship of an old man, usually a diviner or prophet, and the girl under that of a matron, withdrew to some secluded spot, in which tutor and pupil lived in a lodge built for the purpose, from which all persons except the novice and the tutor were rigidly excluded. During this period of strict seclusion, the novice was subjected to a rigorous fast and dosed with prescribed powders and decoctions, and his face, shoulders, and breast were blackened to symbolize the mental darkness in which the novice or initiate then was and also his physical want of occult power. The initiate was directed carefully to observe his or her dreams or visions during this fast and to report them in minutest detail to his tutor, whose duty it was to give attention to the behavior of his charge. In the fulfilment of his duty, the tutor frequently conferred with the ancients, the elders and chief women of the clan and tribe, concerning his charge, in order the better to choose from the occult hints embodied in the dreams and visions what should be selected, or rather what had been suggested in the dreams as the tutelary or guardian genius of the initiate, on which would in the future depend the welfare and security of his life, his oyaron, and, lastly, what vocations he should choose to be successful in after life. The oyaron revealed in one of these mysterious dreams or visions consisted usually of the first trifle that impressed the imagination of the dreamer—a calumet, a pipe, a knife, a bow or an arrow, a bearskin, a plant, an animal, an action, a game: in a word, anything might become, if suggested in a dream or vision, a tutelary or an oyaron. But what is fundamental and important is that it was not believed that the object itself was in fact a spirit or genius, but that it was its embodiment, the symbol or outward sign of the union subsisting between the soul and its tutelary or guardian genius, through the guidance and potency of which the soul must know and do everything; for, by virtue of the oyaron a person could transform himself in shape and size, and could do what he pleased, unless checked by a more powerful orenda (q. v.) guided by a more astute oyaron; it was the subjective being which was the means of his metamorphoses, his enchantments, whether he regarded these changes real or whether he was persuaded that it was the soul alone that detached itself, or the genius that acted in conformity with his own intention and according to his will.

Tutelaries had not the same efficiency, nor the same scope of action. There were persons more favored, more enlightened, than the common people, through the guidance of genii of superior potency, enabling the souls of such persons to feel and to see not only what concerned their possessors personally, but to see even into the very bottom of the souls of other persons, to pierce through the veil which covered them, and there to perceive the natural and the innate desires and promptings which those souls might have had, although these souls themselves had not perceived them, or at least had not expressed them by dreams and visions, or although so expressed in this peculiar manner, those revelations had been entirely forgotten. It was this ability of seeing into the bodies of men that gave these persons the name saiot-katta (Huron), or shagotgathwas (Onondaga), or agotsinnachen (by both Hurons and Iroquois), the first signifying 'One who examines another by seeing,' literally, 'one customarily looks at another.' But beyond this occult knowledge of hidden things, they professed the further ability to perform still other wonders by means of certain chants, songs, and dances, through which they were enabled to put forth their own orenda. In this capacity, a person of this class received the name arendiowanen (for harendiowanen), a compound of the noun orenda and the qualifier -wanen, 'large,' 'great,' 'powerful,' together signifying 'his orenda is powerful,' or 'one whose orenda is powerful.' Lastly, the intercourse of the persons having potent orenda and superior oyaron, with spirits, especially those regarded as monstrous in form and disposition and as hostile to the welfare of man, gave them the name of agotkon, 'one who is an otkon' (q. v.).

Those having powerful orenda and possessing the protection of a potent and resourceful oyaron were regarded as wise men, knowing both human and divine things, the efficacy of plants, rocks, ores, and all the occult virtues and secrets of nature; not only could they sound the depths of the hearts of other persons, but they could foresee what would come to pass in the future, read the fate of men in the signs, wonders, and omens of the earth, claiming to maintain intimate intercourse with the gods, a favor of which less-gifted persons were quite unworthy. These reputed favors of the gods added to an austerity of life and a well-regulated code of manners, at least in appearance, and a conduct above suspicion, or at least censure, gained them the respect if not the fear of all persons, who consulted them as oracles, as sources of truth, and the favored mediators between man and the gods. They could foresee the success or failure of war or a journey, could divine the secret source or cause of illness, could suggest what would make a hunting or a fishing trip successful, could discover things lost by theft, the source of evil and of spells and enchantments, and they could apply their art to exorcise them, to drive them away and to apply the proper remedies to thwart their purposes. They were also adepts in making their calling one of power and authority, and a source of profit and remuneration.

The person whose life was regarded as being under the protection of some being embodied in a material thing, in this occult manner, had less reason for apprehension than he whose life was so protected by some particular animal, for should the animal die, it was a foregone conclusion that he himself incurred the risk of a like fate. This belief was so strong that many seemingly proved its truth by dying soon after the known death of the tutelary animal. This connection of things, which, although alien to man, had nevertheless such an intimate relation to his life, sprang from a motion, an innate impulse, or from a natural desire of the soul, which drew it toward the object and established a moral union between the two, upon the maintenance of which depended the welfare of the person and the peace of his soul. This desire or longing for something seen in a dream or vision was very different from the momentary or voluntary craving which sprang from a knowledge of the object toward which the mind was directed; for it was innate, intrinsic, to the soul, and did not rest on any knowledge of the need of the thing by the mind itself, although it had so much interest in knowing what the soul desired or needed; and, indeed, it would not be strange that the mind should not know anything about it, should the tutelary fail to express itself through dreams or visions.

The unfortunate consequences to which, it was believed, one would be exposed, should he or she fail to provide the soul with what it desired or required as indicated in a dream or vision, compelled the people scrupulously to observe all dreams with the utmost care and diligence, and engaged not only the dreamer but all his tribesmen to obtain for him all the satisfaction that he could desire in the fulfilment of his dream. This was done in such manner that, on these occasions, not only did they not refuse anything asked of them (a refusal being a stigma of the utmost infamy), but they went even farther than that which would have given satisfaction, and sacrificed their most precious possessions.

In addition to those tutelaries belonging to every person, there were oyaron common to the family, the gens, or the clan, and probably to the tribe, which were placed in the lodge. Sacrifices and offerings were made to them of dogs, other animals, and various articles of food, raiment, and adornment. Warriors carried their personal oyaron carefully wrapped in some sacred skin, and they did not cease from invoking it to give them victory over their enemies. The oyaron was an efficient aid to the shaman in all things: in making medicines, in healing wounds, in performing the miracles of his art, and in exorcising the spells cast by other shamans and in thwarting their enchantments. The sacrifice or offering was a very important part of the cult of the oyaron, for should one have failed to make in its honor a feast, an offering, or a sacrifice, to feed it, keep it alive, and give it renewed strength, at stated periods, the oyaron would have become angry, and, if too long neglected, would have turned on its owner or owners and caused him or them troubles, illness, and probably death. It was a doctrine of this philosophy of the oyaron that if it suggested the prohibition of anything during the treatment of a patient by a shaman and this prohibition was neglected or disregarded, the patient would invariably have a relapse. Of such a patient the Tuscarora say "one is beoyaron-ed" (if such a hybrid be permitted for illustration), and is in origin and application like the English "bewitched." These prohibitions are what are commonly called taboo. This transgression of the dictum of some oyaron, or god, becomes sin in the higher cults of man, and this fact leads to the understanding of the nature and genesis of the concept of the taboo.

There was a class of shamans of both sexes who cast spells and enchantments solely for the purpose of doing evil, for the intent of executing private vengeance, or for the gratification of malice, and justly were they regarded with awe and fear. In Iroquois, they received the name agotkon, or hoñnatkon—i. e. 'they are otkons,' or persons having the magic power of monstrous beings. There were also shamans of both sexes who exerted their magic power under the guidance of their several oyaron to secure and promote the welfare of their cotribesmen by consenting to attempt to correct and undo the wrongs and evils devised and perpetrated by the other class. In either class the ability to do what was not normal sprang from the same principle, the conjectured possession of orenda, or magic power.

By the combined astuteness and potency of the oyaron of persons added to that of their own inherent orenda, some highly favored individuals became immune to all powers and influences belonging to the earth, since they knew all things, saw all things, and could do all things. Such personages or beings were naturally shunned and feared, because of this imputed invulnerability and immunity from all causes having their origin on the earth. (J. N. B. H.)

Oyateshicha ('bad nation'). A band of the Mdewakanton Sioux. Neill gave their habitat as on Rice cr., Minn., 7 m. above the falls of St Anthony. In 1853 their village was on Minnesota r., 7 m. from the agency in Minnesota. In 1858 they removed to Oak Grove, and subsequently to Nebraska with other Santee Sioux.

Oydican. A tribe or subtribe, possibly Coahuiltecan, represented in 1706 and later at San Francisco Solano mission, near the lower Rio Grande. For their affiliation, see Terocodame, a tribe of the same locality with whom they intermarried and with whom they were associated at the mission. The Oydican seem to have belonged to what was called the Terocodame band (MS. Baptismal Rec., 1706-07, partidas 181, 239, 261, 271, 316). (H. E. B.)

Oydica.—MS. Baptismal Rec., op. cit., partida 261.

Oyike (Oyi-ké, 'winter people', from Tewa oyi, 'frost'). One of the two branches into which each well-regulated Tewa village is divided in consequence of certain traditional beliefs regarding the religious organization of that people.

Oyi-ké.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 304, 1890. Oyique.—Bandelier in Century Cyclop. of Names, 1894.

Oypatukla (Ahepat-okla, 'potato-eating people', referring to the native hog-potato). The northeastern of the three divisions into which the Choctaw were distinguished for some time previous to their removal w. of the Mississippi. By Romans the name is mistranslated 'small nation.' For the dividing line between this district and that to the w., see Okla-falaya. For about 9 m. the dividing line between it and the southeastern district was formed by a trail running from Concha to Ayanabi, i. e. from the former place to the dividing ridge between the N. E. prong of Chickasawhay and Yanubbee crs., about 1 m. from Ayanabi, in Kemper co., Miss. "From this point in the trail on the dividing ridge, the line ran southerly on the ridge some 3 m. until it struck the 'divide' between Petickfa and Black Water. It kept this divide easterly down to the confluence of these two creeks." From this point to Ponta cr. the line was continued by a trail leading to Coosha. "Ponta cr. from the trail-crossing, downward and eastward, constituted the remainder of the line separating the two districts."—Halbert in Pub. Ala. Hist. Soc., Misc. Coll., I, 378-79, 1901.

Pa. The Fire clan of the Tewa pueblos of San Ildefonso and Nambe, N. Mex.

Pa-táa.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 350, 1896 (táa = 'people').

Pa (Pa'). The extinct Deer clan of the former pueblo of Pecos, N. Mex.

Pa'+.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 350, 1896 (+ = ash, 'people').

Paac. A tribe or subtribe, probably Coahuiltecan, met by Massanet in 1691 on an arroyo 6 leagues s. w. of Nueces r., Texas, which the Spaniards called San Lucas, or Arroyo del Carmichael, and which the Indians called Guanapacti (Massanet, Diario, in Doc. Hist. Texas, i, 92, MS.). This tribe was in a rancheria together with Quemis, Pachules, Ocanas, Chaguanes, and Pastalucs (Pastalacs?). Cf. Pakara. (H. E. B.)

Paachiqui. A tribe, apparently Coahuiltecan, mentioned in 1690 by Massanet in a list of tribes met by him between the presidio of Coahuila in Mexico and the Hasinai country of Texas. In the same list he named Parchagues, which would indicate their distinctness (Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, 1716, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS.). On his expedition in 1691 from San Salvador del Valle mission, Massanet found them on the right bank of "Rio Hondo," 11 leagues e. of the Nueces, with the Patchal, Papañaca, Pacuáchiam, Aguapálam, Samanpác, Vánca, Payaván (Payaban), and Patavó (Pataguo) tribes. At the same point, a few hours later, he was visited by the Pitahay, Apavsi, and Patsau. These Indians called Rio Hondo "Puanapajac" (Massanet, Diario, 1691, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 94, MS.). Several of the tribes named above were later gathered at San Francisco Solano and San Antonio de Valero missions, Texas, but the name of Paachiqui does not appear among them. (H. E. B.)

Pachiquis.—Massanet, op. cit., 1690.

Paako. A former pueblo, evidently of the Tanos, s. of the mining camp of San Pedro, in lat. 35° 15', Santa Fé co., N.

central N. Mex. The village was of the compact communal type, and its houses, which were generally of 2 stories, were apparently constructed of rubble. It contained 3 circular kivas and as many stone inclosures which doubtless had been corrals for flocks, and which in themselves, if not of modern origin, would point to the occupancy of the pueblo in historic times. From its situation and the available evidence there is doubt as to whether the pueblo was the home of the Tigua or Tanos people. Regarding this Bandelier has learned that Paako was the term applied to the pueblo by the Tanos of Santo Domingo (the same name also having been used by Oñate in 1598), who claim that it was a village of their people, while the early Spanish documents refer to it as a Tigua settlement with the additional Spanish designation "San Pedro." Having been situated on the borderland of these two tribal divisions it is not improbable that the village was made up of members of both, and was referred to at various times as pertaining to the Tigua. Since the ruins are claimed by the Tanos to be those of one of the pueblos of their ancestors, however, and since it was separated from the nearest Tigua villages to the southward by the lofty and densely wooded Sierra de Carnué at a time when intertribal disturbances were common, the settlement is classed as that of the Tanos people. According to Bandelier the pueblo was inhabited at least as late as 1626, but was abandoned prior to 1670. Shea (Cath. Missions, 82, 1855) states that a mission was founded at San Pedro del Cuchillo (which seems to be the same) in 1661. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 112 et seq., 1892. Paáoo.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 118, 1871. Pa-a-ko.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 112, 1892 (Tanos name). Pä-qu.—Bandelier, Gilded Man, 221, 1893. San Pablo.—Zarate-Salmeron (ca. 1629) quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 113, 1892 (apparently the original Saint name). San Pedro.—Niel (ca. 1629) quoted by Bandelier, ibid. (so changed from "San Pablo" by Niel). San Pedro del Cuchillo.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 82, 1855.

Paauwis (Pa-au'-wis). A former Siuslaw village on Siuslaw r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Pabaksa ('cut heads'). A division of the Upper Yanktonai Sioux, formerly roaming, with other bands, the country from L. Traverse, Minn., to Devils lake, N. Dak. They are now with the Sisseton and Wahpeton on Devils Lake res., N. Dak., where, under the designation Devil's Lake Sioux, the three bands numbered 985 in 1906.

Pabor. A tribe or subtribe, possibly Coahuiltecan, members of which were at San Francisco Solano mission, near the Rio Grande, in 1706–07. They seem to have belonged to the Terocodame (q. v.) band or confederacy, for a Pabor was interpreter for this band at the mission (MS. Baptismal Rec., 1706–07, partidas 161, 210, 248, 249, 291, 301). (H. E. B.)

Babor.—Ibid., partida 210. Bobor.—Ibid., partida 161.

Pac. See Shoe-pack.

Pacana. A small tribe of unknown affinity, but probably belonging to the same group as the Alibamu and Koasati, mentioned by Adair in 1775 as one of those incorporated with the Muscogee or Creek confederacy. Their town may have been that known as Pakan-tallahassee (q. v.), i. e. 'Pacana old town,' on the E. side of Lower Coosa r., Ala. In connection with several other small tribes in the French interest they crossed the Mississippi on the withdrawal of the French from the Alabama region in 1764, and in 1805 were described by Sibley as living on Calcasieu r., La., having then about 30 men and speaking a language different from those around them, but using also the Mobilian trade jargon. The various renderings of the name are all guesses, ranging from 'pecan,' 'mayapple,' and 'peach orchard,' to 'high,' 'superior,' and 'upper ones.' (J. M.)

Pacane. See Pecan.

Pacaruja. Mentioned by Uhde (Länder, 121, 1861) as a tribe living in the 18th century on the Texas coast between the Nueces and the Rio Grande.

Paccamagannant. An unidentified Indian village probably near Patuxent r., Md., about 1610.

Paccamagannant.—Pory in Smith (1629), Va., II, 62, repr. 1819. Paccamagannat.—Bozman, Md., 151, 1837.

Pachado. A village of Christian Indians near Middleboro, Mass., in 1703, probably connected with the Wampanoag.—Cotton (1703) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., II, 244, 1830.

Pachal. A tribe, apparently Coahuiltecan, which in the latter part of the 17th century ranged on both sides of the Rio Grande below the present Eagle Pass, Texas. Massanet met some of them at rancherias 10 and 6 leagues S. W. of Nueces r. with Quemé, Orana, Chaguan (Siaguan), Pastaluc, and Paac Indians, and at "Rio Hondo", 11 leagues N. E. of the Nueces, with Sanpanal, Vánca, Payaván, Aguapálan, Samampác, Patavó

(Pataguo), Pitahay, Apaysi, and Patsau Indians (Massanet, Diario, 1691, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 92, 94, MS.). In 1699 Fray Diego de Salazar founded San Juan Bautista mission on Sabinas r. with Pachal and Chaguan (Siaguan), Mescal, and Xarame Indians from near the Sabinas (Portillo, Apuntes para la Historia Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 278–79, 1888). Shortly afterward the mission was reestablished on the Rio Grande near Presidio del Rio Grande, with the same and other tribes (Morfi, Viage de Indios, 1778, in Doc. Hist. Mex., 3d s., IV, 440–41, 1856). In 1703 members of the tribe were connected with San Bernardo mission (Portillo, op. cit., 288). In 1728 Rivera reported Pachoches (Pachules?), then a fragmentary tribe, at Caldera mission, S. of Sabinas r. (Diario, leg. 2763, 1736). The name Pachal is much like Patzau, but since Massanet mentions both in the same list, they are probably distinct. (H. E. B.)

Pachales.—Diego de Salazar y San Buenaventura, 1691, in Portillo, op. cit. Pachoches.—Rivera (1728), Diario, leg. 2763, 1736 (identical?). Pachules.—Massanet, op. cit., 92, 1691. Pachal.—Massanet, 1691, op. cit. Pachales.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864.

Pachalauque. A Coahuiltecan tribe at Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción de Acuña mission, Texas, in the 18th century. That these people belonged to the Coahuiltecan family is evidenced not only by the form of the name and the fact that members thereof were taken to the mission with tribes unquestionably Coahuiltecan, but by more direct testimony. A missionary, in doubt, recorded one convert as either "Pachalauque or Orejona" (Libro de Casamientos, partida 62, MS.). Both of these tribes were well known at the mission, and must have spoken the same language, or this doubt would not have arisen. That the Orejones were Coahuiltecan is proved by the fact that they are contained in the García list of 1760 as among the tribes speaking that language. That the Pachalauque were distinct from the Pajalat is also clear, for they are frequently distinguished on the same page of the records by a single missionary, and even in a single entry one party to a marriage is entered as a Pajalat and the other a Pachalauque (Libro de Casamientos, partidas 1–62, MS.). That they were distinct from the Pastaluc (q. v.) is not so certain. They entered Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción de Acuña mission as early as 1733 with the Pajalat, Tilpacopal, Patumaco, Patalca, Tiloja, Siquipil, and Xarame tribes (ibid.), and there is evidence that before this time they intermarried with the Patumaco particularly (ibid., partida 2). While at the mission they intermarried most frequently with these and the Tilpacopal. A Pacha-laque was married to a Tilpacopal at this mission as late as 1773 (ibid., partida 214). Orozco y Berra (Geog., 304, 1864) locates the Pajalaques, who may be the same, on San Antonio r. (H. E. B.)

Pachaloco. A former tribe of N. E. Mexico, probably Coahuiltecan, which was gathered into the mission of San Juan Bautista, Coahuila, at its second foundation in 1701 (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864). Evidently a division of the Pachal. Cf. Pachalague.

Pachawal. A Kawia village in the San Jacinto mts., s. Cal. Los Coyotes, a name which appears to have been applied to this place, is now a reservation of non-arable mountainous land, comprising 22,640 acres, 85 m. from Mission Tule River agency, transferred in 1903 to the Pala agency. It contains also the Agua Caliente settlement of San Ysidro or Wilakal, and the Diegueño settlement of San Ignacio. The total population of the reservation in 1903 is given as 106.

Pacheenaht. A Nootka tribe on San Juan harbor, Vancouver id. Their village is Pacheena, at the mouth of San Juan r. Pop. 71 in 1897, 54 in 1906.

Pacheena.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 158, 1901. Pacheenaht.—Sproat, Savage Life, 308, 1868. Pashe-

Pachera. A small division of the Tarahumare, and the name of their principal village at the extreme headwaters of the N. branch of the Rio Nonoava, under the municipality of Guerrero, w. Chihuahua, Mexico. According to Orozco y Berra (Geog., 34, 1864) they spoke a dialect slightly different from that of the Tarahumare proper.

Pachera.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 333, 1857. Santa Rosa de Santa María.—Ibid.

Pachgantschihilas. See Buckongahelas.

Pachhepes. A former village in California, said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Pack. See Shoe-pack.

Pacohamos ('trout'). A society or gens of the Sauk.

Pá-cá-há-mó-á.—Long, Exped. St Peter's R., II, 231, 1824.

Pacpul. A Coahuiltecan tribe at Caldera mission, Coahuila, in 1689. It was a chief of this tribe, called Juan, who assisted in taking one of the survivors of La Salle's party from N. of the Rio Grande to the presidio of Coahuila (Massanet in Texas Hist. Ass'n Quar., II, 284, 1899).

In 1691 Massanet had with him a Pacpul guide who explained to the Payaya Indians at San Antonio the meaning of the mass and interpreted Massanet's discourse (Diario, Mem. de la Nueva España, XXVII, 96, MS.). This indicates that the Coahuiltecan language extended to the San Antonio, at least. (H. E. B.)

Pacpoles.—Rivera, Diario, leg. 2763, 1736.

Pacsiol. A former Chumashan village near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Pacuaches. A former tribe of N. E. Mexico or s. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, members of which were gathered into San Bernardo mission on the lower Rio Grande, although their proper habitat was 15 leagues distant.

Pacuáchiam. A tribe or subtribe, probably Coahuiltecan, met by Massanet in 1691 on Rio Hondo, Texas, which was called by the Indians Guanapajac. They were with other tribes or bands which Massanet called Sanpanal, Patchal, Papañaca, Parchiquis, Aguapálam, Samampác, Vánca, Payaván, and Patavó. At the same point Massanet was visited by the Pitahay, Apaysi, and Patsan or Patzau (Diario, in Doc. Hist. Tex., I, 94, MS.). The Colton map of Texas (1878) gives "Paguache crossing" just above Presidio San Juan Bautista, on the Rio Grande. Cf. Pacuaches. (H. E. B.)

Pacuchianis.—Massanet (1690) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS. (identical?).

Paddle tablets. See Duck tablets, Problematical objects.

Padjegadjin (Pa-dje'-ga-djin', 'forest extending across'). A former Kansa village on Kansas r., Kan. (J. O. D.)

Padli. A Padlimiut Eskimo settlement at the head of the fjord of the same name where the Akudnirmiut and Padlimiut gather in summer to catch salmon.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Padlimiut. A tribe of Central Eskimo occupying the E. coast of Baffin land from Exeter to C. Hooper and numbering 43 in 1883. Their villages are Ekaloaping, Idjuniving, Itijarelling, Karmakdjuin, Kekertakdjuin, Kingnelling, Padli, and Siorartijung.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 441, 1888.

Padshilaika (Creek: 'pigeon roost'). A former Yuchi town at the junction of Patchilaika cr. with Flint r., Macon co., Ga. According to Hawkins the Yuchi moved there from Savannah r. soon after 1729.

Pad-gee-li-gau.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 62, 1848.

Padahiläka.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 142, 1884. Pigeon Roost.—Ibid.

Pafallaya. A province traversed by De Soto and his army in Nov. 1540, after the battle of Mauvila and before reaching Taliepatava, Cabusto, and Chicaça. It was probably in E. Mississippi. Pickett places it in Green, Marengo, and Sumter cos., w. Ala., and considers its people to have been Choctaw. See Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 160, 1850.

Pagaichi. A former Tarahumare settlement on the headwaters of Rio Nonoava, s. w. Chihuahua, Mexico, 6 leagues n. of Carichic, and near Nonoava.

Pagaichi.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 329, 1857. Paguichic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864. Paguichique.—Censo del Estado de Chihuahua, index, 11, 1904 (name of present pueblo).

Pagaits (Pa-ga'-its, 'fish-creek people'). A Paiute tribe formerly near Colville, s. e. Nevada; pop. 34 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Pagantso (Pa'-gan-tso). A Paviotso division of 3 bands formerly living in Ruby valley, n. e. Nevada; pop. 172 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 52, 1874.

Pagatsu (Pä'gatsü, 'head of the stream'). Mentioned by Mooney (14th Rep. B. A. E., 1045, 1896) as an extinct division of the Comanche. Cf. Parkenaum.

Pagayuts (Pa-ga-yu-ats). One of the tribes, known under the collective term Gosiute, formerly on Otter cr., s. w. Utah.—Powell and Ingalls in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874.

Paghuukdhinpe (Jaxu'-uyün'-de, 'where they dwelt on a mountain'). A Santuukdhin Osage village on the e. side of Verdigris r., Ind. T. (J. O. D.)

Pagmi. Described in 1554 (Ibarra cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 73, 1889) as a most beautiful city adorned with very sumptuous edifices, extending over 3 leagues, with great houses of 3 stories, and with extensive plazas, and the houses surrounded with walls that appeared to be of masonry. The imaginary town was also represented as abandoned, the inhabitants having gone eastward. The locality was seemingly in what is now s. w. United States or n. w. Mexico.

Paguan. A tribe reported by Massanet (Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS.) on the road from Coahuila to the Tejas (Texas) country in 1690, and probably affiliated with the Coahuiltecan stock. Cf. Paguanan.

Paguanan. A tribe or subtribe, members of which were baptized at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas, in 1743–48. They may have been the same as the Payuguan (q. v.), as the two names are not found to have been used by the same writer. They were associated with the Cagnas, Tou, Zana, Sijame, Ujuipe, and Hierbipiamo (Ervipiamé) tribes, and their language, some words of which are preserved, seems to have been the same as that of most of these other tribes (MS. Baptismal Rec., partidas 653, 681, 711, 782).

Pahuanan.—Baptismal Rec., op. cit., 852, 1751.

Paguato (native name Kwistyi, 'take it down,' referring to an ancient tradition). A former summer village of the Lagunas, now a permanently occupied pueblo of that tribe; situated 8 m. n. of Laguna, Valencia co., N. Mex. Next to the parent pueblo it is said to be the oldest and largest of the Laguna villages, the population numbering 350 or 400. Not to be confounded with Pojoaque, although authors have confused the two names. See Keresan Family, Laguna, Pueblos. (F. W. H.)

Paguemi. Described by Ibarra in 1554 (Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 72, 1889) as an abandoned pueblo whose houses were of several stories, and where there were traces of metals having been smelted. Situated in a great plain "adjoining those of the vacas—the buffalo plains." It is apparently imaginary.

Paguits (Pa-gu'-its, 'fish people'). A Paiute band about Pagu (Fish) lake, s. w. Utah; pop. 68 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Pagwiho (Pa-gwi'-ho). A Paviotso tribe formerly living in the adobe meadows near Mono lake, E. Cal.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Pahatsi ('campers at the mountain top'). One of the three principal divisions of the Osage tribe, commonly known as Great Osage.

Bar-har-cha.—Pénicaut (1719) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 151, note, 1869. Elder Osages.—Dorsey in Am. name). pahkai.—Dorsey, Geog. MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1898.

Pahkanu. A band of Indians, probably Moquelumnan, formerly frequenting the banks of Stanislaus and Tuolumne rs., central California.—Wessells (1853) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 30, 1857.

Paho. See Prayer-sticks.

Pahoa. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indica, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages, probably on the South Carolina coast, visited by Ayllon in 1520.

Pahosalgi. An extinct Creek clan, the name of which can be traced only in war titles, as Pah6s'-hádaho.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 155, 1884.

Pahquetecai ('rainbow town'). A village of the ancestors of the present Tigua pueblo of Isleta, N. Mex.

Pah-quet-ai.—Lummis, Man who Married the Moon, 161, 1894. Piaqui.—Ojeda (1598) in Doc. Ind., XVI, 102, 1871 (possibly identical).

Pahkapaha. See Pushipaho.

Pahuirachia. A former rancharia of the Tarahumara in the district and municipality of Guerrero, Chihuahua, Mexico, but now a civilized rancho, with 662 inhabitants in 1900.

Pahuirachia.—Censo del Estado de Chihuahua, 12, 1904. Pahuirachia.—Orosco y Barra, Geog., 328, 1864.

Pahvant. A Ute division occupying a considerable territory in w. central Utah, their chief seat being Corn cr. According to Powell they speak the same language as the Uintah, and socially affiliate and intermarry with them. Some are now on Uintah res., and are classed officially with the Ute. There were said to be 134 in Utah in 1885, not under an agent.

Pagampacho.—Escalante (1776) quoted by Duro, Pedakoa, 162, 1862 (probably identical). Pagampachis.—Dominguez and Escalante (1776) in Doc. Hist. Painting. The tribes N. of Mexico, as well as those of every part of the continent except, perhaps, the higher arctic regions, delighted in the use of color. It was very generally employed for embellishing the person and in applying decorative and symbolic designs to habitations, sculptures, masks, shields, articles of bark, skin, pottery, etc., in executing pictographs upon natural surfaces of many kinds, as on cliffs and the walls of caverns, and in preparing the symbolic embellishments of altars and sacred chambers (see Dry-painting, Graphic art). Color was applied to the person for decorative purposes as an essential feature of the toilet: for impressing beholders with admiration or fear; for purposes of obscurity and deception; in applying tribal, personal, or other denotive devices; in the application of symbolic designs, especially on ceremonial occasions; and as a means of protection from insects and the sun (see Adornment). The native love of color and skill in its use were manifested especially in decorative work. This is illustrated by the wonderful masks and totem poles of the N. W. coast tribes (Bass), and in the artistic polychrome pottery (q. v.) of the Pueblos (Fewkes). Little advance had been made in representative or pictorial art, yet some of the productions are noteworthy, as illustrated in the Hopi katsina work (Fewkes) and in the Kiowa ceremonial paintings on skins described by Mooney, although some of the latter show unmistakable evidence of the influence of the whites.

WOODEN BRUSHES AND PAINTING STICKS

The pigments were derived from many sources, but were mainly of mineral origin (see Dyes and Pigments), especially the oxides of iron (see Hematite) and carbonate of copper. The aborigines were skilled in preparing the mineral colors, which were usually ground in small mortars or rubbed down on a flat stone, and in extracting stains and dyes from vegetal substances. The colors were applied with a dry point or surface, as with a piece of chalk, charcoal, or clay; or, when mixed with water or oil, with the fingers or hand, or a stick, brush, or pad, and also sprayed on with the mouth, as in Pueblo mask painting. Brushes were rude, consisting often of fibrous substances, such as bits of wood, bark, yucca, or reeds, chewed, beaten, or rubbed at one end until sufficiently pliable to deliver the color; and great skill was shown by many of the tribes in the use of these crude tools. Hair was not in general use, although excellent brushes are now made by the more advanced tribes. The brushes used by the tribes of the N. W. coast were often provided with beautifully carved handles. Very interesting painting implements are seen in some sections. Paddle-shaped or spatulate bits of wood are used, applied edgewise for thin lines and flatwise for covering spaces; and striping tools having two or three points and neatly carved of bone and ivory are in use by the Eskimo (Turner). The Plains tribes employed a flat piece of spongy bone from the knee joint of a buffalo or an ox; it has a sharp edge of rounded outline which serves for drawing lines, while the flat side serves for spreading the color over large areas. These tools, being porous, have the advantage of holding a quantity of liquid color. Shells were frequently used for paint cups, while for this purpose the Pueblos made miniature jars and bowls of pottery, sometimes in clusters. Colors in the form of powder, sand, clay, and meal were used, and are still used, by several tribes in preparing dry-paintings (q. v.) for ceremonial purposes which are executed on the floors of ceremonial chambers or altars (Matthews, Stevenson, Fewkes). See Art, Ornament.

Paiute. A term involved in great confusion. In common usage it has been applied at one time or another to most of the Shoshonean tribes of w. Utah, s. Arizona, s. Idaho, s. Oregon, Nevada, and s. and s. California. The generally accepted idea is that the term originated from the word puh, 'water,' and Ute, hence 'water Ute'; or from puh, 'true,' and Ute—'true Ute'; but neither of these interpretations is satisfactory. Powell states that the name properly belongs exclusively to the Corn Creek tribe of s. w. Utah, but has been extended to include many other tribes. In the present case the term is employed as a convenient divisional name for the tribes occupying s. w. Utah from about the locality of Beaver, the s. w. part of Nevada, and the

s. w. part of Arizona, excluding the Chemehuevi.

With regard to the Indians of Walker River and Pyramid Lake reservations, who constitute the main body of those commonly known as Paiute, Powell claims that they are not Paiute at all, but another tribe which he calls Paviotso. He says: "The names by which the tribes are known to white men and the department give no clue to the relationship of the Indians. For example, the Indians in the vicinity of the reservation on the Muddy and the Indians on the Walker River and Pyramid Lake reservations are called Pai or Pah Utes, but the Indians know only those on the Muddy by that name, while those on the other two reservations are known as Paviotsos, and speak a very different language, but closely allied to, if not identical with, that of the Bannocks" (Powell and Ingalls in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873). The Indians of Walker r. and Pyramid lake claim the Bannock as their cousins, and say that they speak the same language. The different small bands have little political coherence, and there is no recognized head-chief. The most influential chiefs among them in modern times have been Winnemucca, who died a few years ago, and Natchez. As a rule they have been peaceable and friendly toward the whites, although in the early sixties they several times came into collision with miners and emigrants, hostility being frequently provoked by the whites themselves. The northern Paiute were more warlike than those of the S., and a considerable number of them took part with the Bannock in the war of 1878. Owing to the fact that the great majority of the Paiute (including the Paviotso) are not on reservations, many of them being attached to the ranches of white men, it is impossible to determine their population, but they may be safely estimated at from 6,500 to 7,000. In 1906 those on reservations in all Nevada were reported to number, at Walker River res., 486; at Moapa res., 129; at Pyramid Lake res., 554; at Duck Valley (Western Shoshoni agency), 267; not under an agency (1906), 3,700. In Utah there were 76 Kaibab, 154 Shivwits, and 370 Paiute not under an agency; in Arizona, 350 Paiute under the Western Nevada School Superintendent.

As a people the Paiute are peaceable, moral, and industrious, and are highly commended for their good qualities by those who have had the best opportunities for judging. While apparently not as bright in intellect as the prairie tribes, they appear to possess more solidity of character. By their willingness and efficiency as workers they have made themselves necessary to the white farmers and have been enabled to supply themselves with good clothing and many of the comforts of life, while on the other hand they have steadily resisted the vices of civilization, so that they are spoken of by one agent as presenting the "singular anomaly" of improvement by contact with the whites. Another authority says: "To these habits and excellence of character may be attributed the fact that they are annually increasing in numbers, and that they are strong, healthy, active people. Many of them are employed as laborers on the farms of white men in all seasons, but they are especially serviceable during the time of harvesting and haymaking." Aside from their earnings among the whites, they derive subsistence from the fish of the lakes, jackrabbits and small game of the sage plains and mountains, and from piñon nuts and other seeds, which they grind into flour for bread. Their ordinary dwelling is the wikiup, or small rounded hut, of tule rushes over a framework of poles, with the ground for a floor and the fire in the center, and almost entirely open at the top. Strangely enough, although appreciating the advantages of civilization so far as relates to good clothing and to such food as they can buy at the stores, they manifest no desire to live in permanent houses or to procure the furniture of civilization, and their wikiups are almost bare of everything excepting a few wicker or grass baskets of their own weaving.

Following are the Paiute bands so far as known: Hokwaits, Ichuarumpats, Kaibab, Kwaiantikwokets, Kwiengomats, Kwumpus, Moapariats, Moquats, Movwiats, Nauwanatats, Nogwats, Nuaguntits, Pagaits, Paguits, Paraniguts, Paruguns, Parumpaiats, Parumpats, Paspikaivats, Pawipits, Pintiats, Sauwontiat, Shivwits, Timpashauwagotsits, Tsuwarits, Uainuints, Uinkarets, Unkaniguts, Unkapanukuints, Utumpaiats, and Yagats. Piute Snakes.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 344, 1873.

Pajalat. One of three tribes mentioned by Espinosa (Crónica Apostolica, I, 459, 1746) as living near San Antonio r., Texas, when the Franciscan missions were removed thither in 1730-31. The other two were the Pacao and Pitalaque (probably the same as the Pachalaque). There were numerous Pajalat in Concepción mission before 1748, and they intermarried there freely with the Patumacas, Pujanes (Cujanes?), Patalcas, and Tilpacopales (MS. records of the mission). They are given as a tribe distinct from the Pachalaque in the records of Concepción mission; for instance, one missionary records marrying a Pajalat and a Pachalaque, which is evidence that these were not considered merely two forms of the same name, though they were probably closely related. According to Gatschet there was a Tonkawa gens or subtribe bearing the same name (Páxalatch, 'mouth open'). (H. E. B.)

Pajarito (Span.: 'little bird'). A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, at Camargo, on the Rio Grande, in 1757, with Venados, Tejones, Tareguanos, and Cueros Que-

mados. Of the Pajaritos, 56 individuals were in the mission (Joseph Tienda de Cuervo, Revista of Camargo, July 13, 1757, in Archivo Gen., Hist., LVI). The Venados were given by García in 1760 as one of the tribes speaking the language of his Manual, i. e. Coahuiltecan. In 1780 Gov. Cabello reported the Paxahitos, evidently the same as the Pajaritos, as a coast tribe s. of the mouth of the Rio Grande. With them he enumerated the Comecrudos, Texones, Guianapaqueños (sic), Manyateños, Cotanans, Aguichachas, and Cueros Quemados (Rep. on coast tribes, May 28, 1780, Béxar Archives, Province of Texas). (H. E. B.)

Pajarito Park (Span.: 'little bird', adapted from the Tewa Tshirege, 'bird', the name of an important ruin within the limits of the tract). Geographically, this term stands for a high, park-like tableland about 40 m. in length and from 15 to 25 m. in width, on the w. side of the Rio Grande in N. New Mexico. It is limited on the n. by the Rio Chama, on the w. by the Jemez mts., and on the s. by the Cañada de Cochiti. It forms the E. side of the Jemez plateau. The tableland is of volcanic origin, its surface from the base of the mountains eastward being capped by a sheet of volcanic tufa, varying in thickness from 100 to 2,000 ft, which had its origin as volcanic ash deposited from the ancient craters of the Jemez range. These great tufa beds vary in color from gray to yellow, and geologically are of vast age. On the E. rim of the s. part of the tableland, along the Rio Grande, are extensive basaltic extrusions of comparatively recent origin, while the bluffs forming the E. rim of the N. half are formed of the conglomerates which mark the w. shore-line of the Miocene lake that once occupied the basin now known as Española valley. Recent basaltic extrusions also occur on the N. rim of the park along the Rio Chama. The mean altitude of the park is about 7,000 ft. The high w. side is heavily forested with pine and spruce; along the Rio Grande side the mesas are covered only with buffalo grass, while between these two extremes lies a zone lightly covered with piñon and juniper, interspersed with stretches of open land. This zone, now comparatively barren from lack of water, was evidently covered with tilled fields at some remote time. Torrential erosion in past ages has dissected this once continuous level tableland into a series of narrow elevated parallel mesas, better described by the Spanish term potreros, extending out from the mountains toward the Rio Grande. These potreros vary in width from a few yards to 2 or 3 m. and from $\frac{1}{2}$ m. to 5 m. in length. They present, especially on the s. side, perpendicular escarpments of from 50 to 500 ft in height, at the base of which is invariably a long talus slope. The canyons lying between the potreros are usually little valleys from $\frac{1}{4}$ m. to 1 m. in width, divided by a now dry arroyo bordered by a narrow, level and very fertile floodplain. These little valleys are now lightly wooded, but show every evidence of tillage in remote times. Pajarito Park is now for the greater part devoid of water except on the side at the base of the mountains. The only streams that carry their water to the Rio Grande for any considerable part of the year are the Santa Clara, the Bravo, and the Rito de los Frijoles. Others sink in the sand within a few miles of their source, and a vast number carry water at all only in flood season. There are very few perennial springs in the park. The principal canyons that cut through it from w. to E. are as follows, beginning at the N.: the Santa Clara, the Chupadero, the Guages, the Alamo, the Pajarito, the Rito de los Frijoles. Between them are hundreds of smaller canyons.

Ethnologically Pajarito Park is of great importance. It stands for a plainly marked, prehistoric ethnic area, the investigation of which throws much light on the ethnological problems of the S. W. The zone of ancient habitation extends from N. to S. the entire length of the park. It is only from 5 to 10 m. in width, and lies between the high timbered western slope and the narrow barren eastern rim overlooking the Rio Grande. The inhabited area did not exceed 300 sq. m. in extent.

The characteristic archeological remains are the ancient pueblo ruins and excavated cliff-dwellings. The latter class of remains exists in vast numbers. Almost every escarpment that presents a southern exposure is honeycombed with these dwellings (see Cliff-dwellings). Many natural caves, originally formed by water and wind erosion, have been utilized for dwelling purposes, either with or without modification, though usually there has been some shaping by excavation to render the home more commodious or convenient. In the form of lodge generally found in the softer tufa formations, the entire front of the cave is open. In some instances the front is closed by a wall of masonry which is entered through a small doorway with stone casing. Another form of cliff-houses of this same general class, which exists here in even greater numbers than those just described, is the wholly excavated dwelling. These are found in the firmer strata of tufa where the walls are less liable to crumble. In these a small doorway has been cut into the perpendicular face of the cliff to a depth of from 1 to 4 ft. The excavation is then expanded into a room usually of sufficient height only to permit of standing erect, varying from roughly circular to rectangular. These rooms rarely exceed 10 ft in the greatest dimension, except those which were used for ceremonial purposes. In these dwellings the main living room usually contains prayer-meal niches, alcoves, and in many cases small back rooms, probably for storage, are connected with them. There is usually a crude fireplace beside the doorway, a ventilating aperture at the floor level and another for a smoke vent above the door. There are no windows. In front of the dwellings, against the cliffs, verandas were built of poles and stone that doubtless served for living rooms during a considerable part of the year. The entire number of excavated cliff-dwellings in Pajarito Park would reach several thousand.

Of the other general class of archeological remains, viz, ancient Pueblo ruins, there are two forms: (1) The "small house" ruins, containing from 2 to 100 rooms, that never exceeded one story in height, of which there are large numbers scattered over the mesa tops and in the valleys. They are of great age and seem to belong to an epoch when the mesas were well watered and the population diffused over considerable areas. (2) The great community houses contained from 1,000 to 1,200 rooms, and 2 to 4 stories. The most noteworthy of these, named from N. to S., are Chipiinuinge, Kwengyauinge, Teeuinge, Poihuuinge, Puye, Shufinne, Tshirege, Otowi, Tsankawi, Tyuonyi, Yapashi, Haatse, Kuapa, and Kotyiti. We find in these the prototype of the present terraced community houses of Taos, Zuni, and the Hopi villages. Many of the ancient buildings were of much greater size than any of the Pueblo houses of the present day. They were built in nearly all cases of stone rudely dressed and laid in adobe mortar. Ceilings and roofs were made of poles, brush, bark, and clay. Floors were made of adobe firmly tamped and smoothed. Walls were plastered with adobe mud, over which a thin wash made of "white earth" was laid from time to time. Doors were small and cased with stone, rarely with wood. There were no real windows. Small circular apertures near the floor aided ventilation. Fireplaces were usually placed beside the doors. These buildings differ from the large Pueblo houses of the present day in having no large and fairly commodious rooms, all apartments being mere rectangular cells ranging in size from 6 × 8 ft to 8 × 14 ft. Exterior rooms in all cases were entered by ladders from above. The type form of these great houses is that of four rectangular structures surrounding a squarish court. Many are found with one or more of the sides open. With the increase of the community additional courts were developed.

The circular kiva, always wholly or in great part subterranean, accompanies all the larger pueblos, from 1 to 15 being found in and about each village. Small reservoirs and other vestiges of primitive irrigation works are found about the large buildings only. The entire district is rich in pictography, the best specimens of which are found etched upon the vertical walls of the cliffs.

The principal collections of archeological material from Pajarito Park are to be found in the National Museum at Washington and the Southwest Museum at Los Angeles, Cal. Noteworthy facts shown by these collections are that the art of decorative glazing was quite advanced among these people, and that their system of symbolism was distinct from any other known. The study of the skeletal remains discloses the fact that the ancient inhabitants of Pajarito Park were a homogeneous people, of medium stature, and of rather inferior muscular development. The prevailing cranial type was dolichocephalic. In view of the fact that the predominant cranial type among the people of all the adjacent Pueblo villages at the present time is brachycephalic, this is of great ethnologic interest. As yet nothing further can be said concerning the relationship of these ancient people to any existing tribes. The time of occupancy of the ancient pueblo and cliff houses is conjectural. Excavations have yielded not a single vestige of Spanish influence, and traditions reaching back of four centuries are of questionable value in determining even approximate chronology. However, both archeological and geological evidence point to long occupancy and remote abandonment of these sites. Tentatively, from 2 to 4 centuries may be assigned as the length of time they had been abandoned before the Spanish invasion in 1540, and it may be said that the accumulating evidence now points to the lengthening of that period. There are no evidences of events of catastrophic character to have caused the disappearance of their inhabitants. In all probability their migration was caused by progressive desiccation of the country and the pressure of predatory enemies.

Pákan-Talahássi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1884.

Pakataghkon (probably for pachatachan, 'split wood.'—Gerard). A former Delaware village, situated a mile from the present Margarettsville, Delaware co., N. Y., at the mouth of Bush Kill. This village is located on the Popachton or Papotunk branch on Sauthier's map of 1779. (W. M. B.)

Pakawa (from Pakawai, referring to tattooing.—Gatschet). Specifically a division of the Coahuiltecan family living not far from San Antonio r., Texas, in the 18th century. Espinosa says that when the missions were removed from E. Texas to this river in 1730–31 there were "in sight three tribes of very docile gentile Indians, the Pacaos, Pajalat, and Pitalaque, who together number more than a thousand persons" (Crónica Apostólica, I, 459, 1746). Some of them entered San Francisco de la Espada mission with the Axcahomos, but deserted in 1737 (Ysasmendi to the Governor, Nov. 22, 1737, MS.). In 1738 Pedro, a "Pachao," was "governor" of this mission (MS. of 1738 in the Archivo General). Some of the tribe were also at Concepción, according to manuscript records of the mission, and "Pacuas" were also at San Bernardo mission, on the Rio Grande (Morfi, Viage de Indios, 442, 1856). (H. E. B.)

Generically the term Pakawa has been applied by Gatschet to include a linguistic family formerly living on both sides of the lower Rio Grande, and practically identical with the Coahuiltecan family (q. v.). Its numerous dialects, according to Gatschet, were spoken in the w. as far as the Sierra Madre and in the e. to or beyond San Antonio r. One dialect of it is preserved in the Manual of Padre Bartholomé García (1760). The tribe to which the name Pakawa appears to apply is that mentioned as the Pintos (Span. 'painted' or 'tattooed'), Pacaos, or Pacuas, etc., their name in their own language, according to Gatschet, being Estok-pakawaila or Newasol-pakawai or, without the prefix, Pakawai or Pakawaila. The only survivors of the tribe in 1886 were two women who were found by Gatschet on the s. bank of the Rio Grande near Reynosa, at a place called La Volsa. They were sometimes called Tompacuas by the Comecrudo, which is or was the name of a rancheria in Hidalgo co., Texas, 20 m. n. of the Rio Grande. (C. T.)

Pala ('water'). A Luiseno village w. of San Luis Rey, San Diego co., Cal. Later the name was applied to a reservation of 160 acres of allotted arable land, under Mission Tule River agency. By court decision in 1901 the Indians of Warner's ranch were dispossessed of their lands, and by act of Congress of May 27, 1902, Pala res. was enlarged by purchase to 3,598 acres, and the Warner ranch people removed thereto in 1903. In the latter year the Tule River agency was divided into the Pala and San Jacinto agencies. In 1865 the pop. of Pala was 162; in 1902, 76; in 1903, after its enlargement, 258; in 1906, 138. See Ind. Aff. Rep., 124, 1865; 175, 1902; 146, 1903; 205, 1906; Hayes MS. quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 460, 1886; Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Mission Inds., 29, 1883. Cf. Palin.

Palacheho (Phalacheho). A former Chickasaw town in n. Mississippi, forming part of a large settlement of 5 towns.—Adair, Am. Ind., 353, 1775.

Palaihnihan (Klamath: from p'laikni, 'mountaineers'). Formerly recognized as a linguistic family in n. e. California, but probably to be regarded, as the result of recent studies by Dixon (Am. Anthrop., vii, 213, 1905), as only a branch of the Shastan ("Shasta-Achomawi") family. Their habitat embraced the drainage area of Pit r. above Montgomery cr. except Goose Lake valley, of which only the s. end was in their territory. Linguistically the group falls into two rather sharply contrasted and numerically unequal divisions, the Achomawi and the Atsugewi. The tribal and minor divisions recognized were the Achomawi, Astakiwi, Atsugewi, Atuami, Chumawi, Hantiwi, Humawhi, Ilmawi, and Puisu. Physically there were considerable differences between these tribes. The Astakiwi and Humawhi have been described by Powers as "most miserable, squalid, peak-faced, mendicant, and mendacious wretches." Their faces were skinny, foreheads low and retreating, bodies lank, and abdomens protuberant. The Atuami were much superior in physique. All the tribes were indifferent hunters. They trapped game by digging pitfalls with fire-hardened sticks and covered them with brush, grass, and earth. These pits were so numerous they gave its name to Pit r., after which these Indians have generally been called. The Humawhi and Astakiwi, having no acorns or salmon, as most other California tribes, were hard pressed for a food supply. Game birds were abundant, but they captured and killed few. Grasshoppers, crickets, trout and suckers, camas, clover blossoms, and bearberries formed their chief diet. The Achomawi of Fall r. subsisted largely on salmon. Among the Palaihnihan woman is said to have held a servile and degraded position; whether maiden or widow she was owned by her father or brother, to be sold, with her children, if any, at his pleasure. Marriage was a matter of bargain and sale, and polygamy was common. A woman was seldom held responsible for adultery, but if a wife deserted her husband and refused to return to him he was allowed to take her life. However, a husband had no control over his wife's personal property, which at her death was claimed by her relatives. In case of the birth of twins, one was almost always destroyed. Cremation was generally practised in cases where persons died of unknown diseases; in all other cases the dead were buried in a sitting posture; the Ilmawi however never burned their dead. The Palaihnihan Indians dwelt chiefly in bark and brush houses of an irregularly quadrangular form, similar to those of the Shasta, or in semisubterranean dwellings like sweat-houses. During the summer these dwellings were abandoned and the people lived in brush shelters while hunting and collecting food. Their social organization was rather loose, the authority of the chief or leader being but nominal. Like the Shasta, whom they resembled in many of their customs and practices, it was not rare for a woman to be a shaman or priest. They had but few religious ceremonies and dances, but like the Maidu had an elaborate creation myth in which the coyote played the most important rôle. Very few individuals of the family remain. Some of them were removed to Round Valley res., Cal., and these, with some natives from Potter valley, numbered 34 in 1889. (R. B. D. F. W. H.)

Palakahu. A division of the Umpqua according to Parker (Jour., 257, 1840); not identified, but evidently either Athapaskan or Yakonan.

Palaquesson. A village or tribe visited by La Salle in Feb. 1687, w. of Brazos r., Texas, having a chief named Palaquechaure. According to La Salle the speech of the people resembled that of the Ceni (Asini, Hasinai=Caddo) whom he had visited the year before. Joutel states that the Palaquesson had no fixed dwelling place, but hunted over a considerable stretch of country, yet when the people came to a fertile tract they settled there, the men preparing the soil for planting and the women sowing the maize. So long as the crops were good the people remained sedentary, but when these failed hunting was resumed, at which times they divided into groups to insure greater success. It is probable that the French encountered these people during one of their hunting periods, as Douay says they were in 10 villages. They knew the Spaniards, from whom they obtained horses, and were allies of the Ceni, joining their war excursions to the s. and e.

The houses of the Palaquesson were of dried grass. On the death of an occupant the dwelling was burned and the survivors erected a new one on another site. Men and women tattooed their faces in lines and their bodies with plant and animal figures. Their boats were similar to those used on the Missouri—a skin stretched over a light framework of wood. Nothing is known of their beliefs. (A. C. F.)

Palatki (Hopi: 'red house'). A prehistoric cliff village in the valley of Oak cr., in the "Red-rock" country, s. of Flagstaff, Ariz.; believed to have been one of the stopping places of the Patki or Cloud clans of the Hopi in their migration from the S.—Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 553-58, 1898.

Palatkwabi ('red land of the south'). The place inhabited by the Patki or Cloud clans of the Hopi prior to their settlement in Tusayan, N. E. Ariz. The locality is somewhere in the great cactus region of s. Arizona.

Pa-lat-kwa-bi.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., vii, 402, 1894, and 17th Rep. B. A. E., 568, 1898. Palatkwapi.—Voth, Traditions of the Hopi, 47, 1905.

Paleolithic implements. The term applied to implements, usually of stone, belonging to the Paleolithic age as first defined in Europe and afterward identified in other countries. In America the Paleolithic, as chronologically distinct from the Neolithic age, is not established, and the more primitive forms of implements, corresponding in general to the Paleolithic implements of Europe, can be properly referred to only as of Paleolithic type. In this connection it should be noted that implements of the most primitive type were made and used by the American tribes, whatsoever their stage of culture progress. See Antiquity, Neolithic age. (W. H. H.)

Paleuyami. A Yokuts (Mariposan) tribe, now extinct, formerly living on Poso cr., Cal. Recorded by Powers, under the name Paleummi, as the Yokuts name of a tribe related to the Paiute. Their dialect was quite different from that of the other Yokuts tribes. See Altin.

Palin. A former Luiseno village in lower San Luis Rey valley, San Diego co., Cal. (Grijalva, 1795, cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 563, 1886). Possibly identical with the present Pala (q. v.), in which event the name was seemingly corrupted by the Spaniards.

Palisades. See Fortification and Defense.

Palisema. A district w. of the Mississippi, five days' march from the province of Coligoa; visited in 1541 by De Soto's troops.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., ii, 178, 1850.

Palladium. This term was the name of the statue of the goddess Pallas or Minerva, preserved in the ancient city of Troy, and supposed to hold protecting watch over the destinies of its people. The use of the term has been broadened to include any similar sacred object of national or tribal veneration. Several of our Indian tribes had such palladiums, which were venerated with ceremonial forms and regarded with zealous care and upon whose continued safe possession the existence and prosperity of the tribe were believed to depend. As a rule the true origin of the object of tribal veneration was lost in obscurity, but was accounted for by a sacred myth which represented it as having been given to the people by their mystic culture-hero at the beginning of the world. A priest was appointed to watch over it, a special depository was provided for it, prayer and sacrifice were made to it, and it was rarely or never exposed to public view except on the occasion of certain great tribal gatherings when it was made the central figure of the ceremony. Like the Hebrew ark of the covenant, it was sometimes carried in the battle front to insure victory over the enemy.

Notable instances are the sacred box of the Cherokee (Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 1900), the metal tablets of the Creeks (Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, II, 1884, 1888), the taimé of the Kiowa (Mooney in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 1898), the medicine arrows of the Cheyenne (Dorsey in Am. Anthropol., v, 644, 1903; Mooney in Mem. Am. Anthropol. Ass'n, I, no. 6, 1907), the "ark" of the Mandan (Maximilian, Trav., 1843; Matthews, Hidatsa, 1877), and the seicha or flat pipe of the Arapaho (Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896; Scott in Am. Anthropol., ix, no. 3, 1907).

The Cherokee sacred box is still remembered in the traditions of their old men, who say that it contained the most sacred belongings of the tribe, and that the prosperity of their people departed after its capture by the Delawares. Their account of its exterior agrees with that given by Adair from the statement of a white man who saw it with them in 1756. It was a rectangular box, about 3 ft long, covered with a dressed deerskin and resting upon blocks to keep it from the earth. It was watched by a sentinel with bow and arrows, who drew an arrow to the head and warned the stranger away when he attempted a closer inspection.

The sacred metal plates of the Creeks were kept by priests of the Wind clan in Tukabatchi town in a depository on one side of the public square. They were said to be 7 in all, 5 of copper and 2 of brass, with engraved characters resembling letters. At times they were said to give out a miraculous ringing sound without being touched. Once a year, at the annual Green Corn dance, they were exhibited to the people from a distance, after which they were washed in the stream, rubbed and cleaned, and put away again for another year. As usual with such things, the Tukabatchi people claimed to have received them from a supernatural being at the beginning of their existence as a people, but it is more likely that they were a relic of some early Spanish expedition, perhaps a trophy from the great battle of Mavila in 1540. They are noted by Adair as early as 1775 and are still preserved in the Creek Nation, Okla.

The taimé of the Kiowa is a small stone image bearing resemblance to the head and bust of a man, decorated with down feathers and with images of the sun and the crescent moon painted upon its breast. It is kept in a parflèche box of peculiar shape and decoration, and, like the Creek plates, was exposed only once a year, at the annual Sun dance. It is still sacredly preserved, but as the dance has not been performed since 1887 the box has not been opened since, not even the custodian being permitted to undo the wrappings.

The medicine arrows of the Cheyenne are 4 in number, of different colors, and were kept together in charge of a special priest from the earliest traditional period, before the tribe had removed from the head of the Mississippi r. They have no connection with the Sun dance, antedating that ceremony in the tribe, but are exposed only on occasion of a solemn purification rite when a Cheyenne has been killed by one of his own tribe. They are still preserved among the Southern Cheyenne, by whom the rite of blood atonement was performed as late as 1904.

The "flat pipe" of the Arapaho is kept by a priest of the Wyoming branch of the tribe, together with an ear of corn and a stone turtle, all of which, according to their tradition, they have had from the beginning of the world. Around these centers the tribal genesis tradition, which is recited when the package is opened, as may be done on special occasions, without regard to other ceremonial periods. The box in which the sacred objects were kept was never allowed to touch the ground, and when on the march the priest in charge, even though mounted, was not allowed to rest it upon his horse, but must carry it upon his own back. See Fetish. (J. M.)

Palm. Only two representatives of the palm family occur in the United States. One of these has a limited distribution in s. California, and is employed somewhat in basketry; but among the Piman tribes of Sonora and Sinaloa, especially, palm leaves were extensively used for making mats for inclosing houses and for hats and basketry. The other variety of palm is the palmetto Sabal, which entered largely into the life of the Indians of s. w. Florida. The Seminole still use the palmetto trunk in house building, and the leaves for thatching, beds, basketry, twine, and rope, and the bud is eaten, raw or baked (5th Rep. B. A. E., 517, 1887). Biedma (1540) speaks of the use of palmetto leaves for thatching, and Dickenson, writing of Florida, says that "an Indian brought a fish boiled on a palmetto leaf and set it down amongst us" (Narr. of a Shipwreck, 1803). According to Bartram (Trans. Am. Ethnol. Soc., III, pt. 1, 49-50, 1853) the Creeks of Alabama had several species of palms which they used for food. One of them (Sabal minus Pers.) is a low plant, without stalk or stem, that bears a vast collection of plumes or drupes with fibrous farinaceous pulpy coating resembling manna. Another species (Serenoa serculata) was used for medicine. Empty pods of the palm were used in dances as ankle rattles by the Tepehuane (Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 477, 1902). (w. H.)

Palomas (Span.: 'doves'). One of the three large villages in the vicinity of Trinity r., Tex., visited by La Salle in 1687. Cavelier states that the village was surrounded by a palisade of cane. The people seemed to be fairly well supplied with horses and were hostile to the Spaniards. Their affiliation is not known. Palomas.—Cavelier (1687) in Shea, Early Voy., 38, 1861. Palona.—Douay quoted by Shea, Discov. Miss. Val., 212, 1852. Palonnas.—Coxe in French, Hist. Coll. Palonies (said to have been so called by the Spaniards because they wore their hair so short as to suggest baldness). Mentioned as a division of the Chemehuevi that occasionally went to the north of Los Angeles, Cal., in 1845.—Ried quoted by Hoffman in Bull. Essex Inst., XVII, 28, 1885.

Paloos (Pā-lus'). A Shahaptian tribe formerly occupying the valley of Palouse r. in Washington and Idaho, and the n. bank of Snake r. as far as its junction with the Columbia. They were found by Lewis and Clark in 1805 on the Clearwater in Idaho. Their closest connection was with the kindred Nez Percés, and they still hold close relations with that tribe. They were included in the Yakima treaty of 1855, but have never recognized the treaty obligations and have declined to lead a reservation life. They have 4 villages, all on Snake r., as follows: Almotu, Palus, Tasawika, and Kasispa. They are active adherents of the Smohalla (q. v.) doctrine. Lewis and Clark estimated their number in 1805 at 1,600; in 1854 they were said to number 500; at present

Pal-wu'-nuh.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 393, 1877.

Pamacocack. A former village of the Powhatan confederacy, on the w. bank of Potomac r., about 30 m. below the present Alexandria, in Prince William co., Va. Another and apparently more important village of the same name was directly opposite, on the Maryland side, from which it is probable that the name properly belonged to the river stretch rather than to the settlement. (J. M.)

Pamacocack.—Smith (1629), Va., Arber ed., map, 1884.

Pamacocack. A former village on the Maryland side of the Potomac, opposite that of the same name on the Virginia side, and about the mouth of Mattawoman cr. and the present Pomonkey, Charles co. It was of some importance, having 60 warriors, or perhaps 250 souls, when visited by Capt. John Smith in 1608. The boy Spelman confuses it with Nacotchtank, which he makes "Nacot-tawtanke." (J. M.)

Pamamelli. A former Luiseño village in Santa Margarita valley, San Diego co., Cal.—Grijalva (1795) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., I, 563, 1886.

Pamaque. A tribe mentioned by Fray Bartholomé García (1760) as one of those speaking the language of his Manual, i. e. Coahuiltecan. They dwelt near the Texas coast between the Nueces and San Antonio rs. Their residence between these streams was made the basis of a claim to them and their relatives, the Piguques and the Pasnacanes, by San Juan Capistrano mission, in a quarrel with Vizarron mission in 1754 (Ynforme of the College of Querétaro to the Commissary Gen., 1754, MS.). That they lived near the coast is evident. A Spanish manuscript of 1752 says: "The Pamaques are from the mouth of the said river [Nueces]." In 1762 the San Antonio missionaries reported them in a list of coast tribes. In 1780 Governor Cabello, naming the coast tribes from the Nueces to Ysla de los Copanes, put the "Pamacas" (undoubtedly the Pamaques) first in the list, which was given in a w. to e. order. This would put them near the mouth of the Nueces (Cabello to Croix, May 28, 1780, MS.). The tribe is evidently the same as Orozco y Berra's Panagues, which he puts on the Nueces.

The Pamaques were closely related to the Piguques and the Pasnacanes, who lived in the same locality. Indeed, the last two tribes seem sometimes to have been considered as subdivisions of the first. They were together in San Juan Capistrano mission, whence they fled together in 1754 (Ynforme, 1754, op. cit.). They were also closely related to the Orejones (q. v.). The wider affiliation of the Pamaques may perhaps be indicated by Cabello's list of their neighbors, cited above. It includes Pamacas (Pamaques), Malaguitas, Orejones, Chayopines (in San Juan Capistrano mission); Pacagues, Borrados (in San Francisco de la Espada); Pajalates, Tacames, Manos de Perro, Copanes, and Cujanes (in Concepción mission). As it was a general policy of the missions, not always carried out, to keep closely related tribes together, it is not improbable that this grouping has ethnological significance.

In 1733 the Pamaques entered San Juan Capistrano mission, and by 1754 the records showed 196 baptisms of this tribe, including, apparently, the Piguques, but not the Pasnacanes, who entered in 1743 (Ynforme, 1754, op. cit.; Santa Ana to the Viceroy, Mar. 4, 1743, MS.). Before 1748 there were numerous "Pamaches" at Concepción mission; these may be the same, although it is not certain (MS. mission records). According to Camberos, missionary at Bahía, the Pamaques were nearly extinguished by 1754 (Letter to the Viceroy, May 6, 1754, MS.), but the tribe was still being missionized at San Juan Capistrano in 1762. At that time a total of 203 "Orejones, Sayopines, Pamaques, and Piguques" was reported there (Ynforme, 1762, op. cit.). According to Cabello, they were still living on the coast in 1780. (H. E. B.)

Pamlico. An Algonquian tribe formerly living on Pamlico r., in Beaufort co., N. C. They were nearly destroyed by smallpox in 1696. The survivors, numbering about 75, lived in 1710 in a single village. They took part in the Tuscarora war of 1711, and at its close that portion of the Tuscarora under treaty with the English agreed to exterminate them. The remnant was probably incorporated as slaves with that tribe. (J. M.)

Pamoranos. Given by Orozco y Berra (Geog., 299, 1864) as a Tamaulipan tribe living in Texas, n. of Laredo. They are mentioned in 1732 by Fr. Juan Lozada as one of numerous tribes who had made peace with the Spaniards. (H. E. B.)

Pamozanes.—Orozco y Berra, op. cit., 294.

Pampopas. A Coahuiltecan tribe formerly living on Nueces r., Tex., 22 leagues from San Juan Bautista mission, with the Tilijaes on the same stream immediately below them. It is one of several tribes mentioned by García (Manual, title, 1760) as speaking the same, i. e. Coahuiltecan, language. They appear to have been in the same territory in 1701 (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864).

Manuscripts dated in 1736–38 confirm the above statements as to their residence on the Nueces (indicating that they sometimes established themselves to the e., even across Rio Frio) and fix their latitude as probably above the junction of Rio Frio with the Nueces (Gov. Sandoval, Aug. 25, 1736, Lamar Papers, Span. MS., no. 31; Testimony of Aug. 29, 1736; Yndiferente de Guerra, 1736–37, Misiones, xxi, Archivo Gen.; Orobio y Basterra, letter of Apr. 26, 1738, Historia, LXXXIV, Archivo Gen.). Rivera (Proyecto, 1728) calls them a roving tribe. In the early part of the 18th century Pampopas were in San Juan Bautista mission, on the Rio Grande, 9 families being there in 1738, together with Tilijyas (Tilijaes), Pitas, Pastalocos, and Mescales (Portillo, Apuntes para la Historia Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 283, 1888; Morfi, Viage de Indios, Doc. Hist. Mex., 3d s., iv, 441, 1856). Fray Antonio de Buenaventura de Olivares, who in 1718 moved San Francisco Solano mission from the Rio Grande and reestablished it as San Antonio de Valero, mentioned the Pampoas (Pampopas) as one of the tribes he intended to gather there (undated MS. letter to the Viceroy), but they went rather to San José de Aguayo mission (q. v.), founded shortly after, where they were settled with Pastias, Sayopines, and Tacasnanes (Pasnacanes?). Apparently all these tribes soon deserted the mission, but some Pampopas were taken back. In 1736 some were recovered from rancherias on the Rio Frio, and in 1737 others from the Medina (Documents, op. cit.). In 1738 Orobio y Basterra (op. cit.) located them "on the banks of Rio de las Nuezes," and suggested enlisting them in a campaign against the Apache, thus indicating their hostility toward that tribe, which seems to have been the rule with the Coahuiltecan group of the Texas coast. The tribe must have been small then, for Orobio y Basterra counted on only 200 warriors from this and three other tribes of a different region. In 1750 Fr. Santa Ana speaks of the Pampopas as quite generally "reduced and attached" to their mission (Petition, Feb. 20, 1750, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 140, MS.); in 1768 Solís wrote as though they comprised a part of the 350 adult men at San José mission (Diario, ibid., xxvii, 270); and in 1793 Revilla-Gigedo implied that they formed a part of the 114 neophytes still at the latter mission (Carta, Dec. 27, 1793, in Dic. Univ. de Hist. y de Geog., v, 447, 1853–56). (H. E. B.)

tan confederacy (q. v.) of Virginia, and still keeping up a recognized tribal organization.

THEODORA OCTAVIA COOK PAMUNKEY

At the time of the first settlement of Virginia they occupied the territory about the junction of the Pamunkey and Mattaponi rs., in King William co., being estimated by Smith in 1608 to number nearly 300 warriors, or perhaps a total of 1,000 souls. Their principal town, destroyed by the English in 1625, was probably not far from the present West Point. They took a leading part in the early wars with the English up to the death of Opechancanough (q. v.), and in consequence were among the greatest sufferers. In 1654 they suffered another heavy loss in the death of their chief Totopotomoi (q. v.), with nearly 100 of his warriors, who had marched to the assistance of the English in repelling an invasion of the mountain tribes. In 1675 their "queen," known as Queen Anne (q. v.), widow of Totopotomoi, again furnished help against the frontier raiders in Bacon's rebellion. For her services on this occasion she received special recognition from the English government. In 1722, when the Pamunkey last appear in a public treaty, they were said to number only about 200. In 1781 Jefferson reported them to number only about 60, of tolerably pure blood, but this estimate is probably too low. They were then occupying a state reservation of about 300 acres in a bend of Pamunkey r., in King William co., opposite White House. Quite a number at that time retained their language. They still occupy the same reservation and keep up their tribal organization under state supervision, with a mixed-blood population of about 140. They live chiefly by fishing, with some small farming, and have entirely lost their language and original characteristics. (J. M.)

Panachsa (Pá-nach-sa). A former Kawia village in the San Jacinto mts., s. Cal.—Barrows, Ethno-Bot. Coahuilla Inds., 27, 1900.

Panalachic (corruption of Tarahumare Banalachic, 'face place', from banalá 'face', chic the locative, referring to the outline of a large rock near by.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 211, 1902). A Tarahumare settlement near the headwaters of the s. branch of Rio Nonoava, lat. 27° 40', lon. 107° 15', Chihuahua, Mexico. Pop. 380 in 1900.

Panamenik. A Karok village on the w. bank of Klamath r., Cal., where the town of Orleans Bar now stands. In 1852 it had 4 houses.

Keemen.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1903 (Yurok name). Panamenik.—Ibid. (correct name). Panem-nik.—Gibbs, MS. Misc., B. A. E., 1852.

Panamint. A Shoshonean division formerly occupying a considerable area in and around Panamint valley, s. e. Cal., and extending s. in scattered rancherias toward Mohave r. Henshaw found a few individuals living at the mining town of Darwin (Panamint) in 1883, and learned that about 150 still survived, scattered here and there, in the desert country e. of Panamint valley. It is uncertain whether their affinities are with the Ute-Chemehuevi or Mono-Paviotso group of Shoshoneans, but are here placed tentatively with the former. The Matarango are mentioned as a subdivision. See Coville in Am. Anthrop., Oct. 1892. (H. W. H.)

Caitech.—Bancroft, Nat. Rac. I, 456, 1874. Kaite.—Henshaw, Panamint MS. vocab. B. A. E., 1883 (asserted by a Panamint to be their own tribal name, but given as their name for the Shoshoni proper). Ke-at.—Gatschet in Wheeler Surv. Rep., VII, 411, 1879.

Panequo. A village or tribe mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as being n. or n. w. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas. The country was the abode of Tonkawan tribes, although Karankawan Indians also sometimes roamed there. The name seems to have been given to Joutel by the Ebahamo, who were probably of Karankawan affinity. (A. C. F.)

Panage.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 124, 1846. Panequo.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 289, 1878.

Pang (Pän or Pä). The Deer clans of the Tewa pueblos of San Ildefonso and Santa Clara, N. Mex.

Pä-táo.—Hodge in Am. Anthrop., IX, 350, 1896 (San Ildefonso form; táo='people'). Pä-táo.—Ibid. (Santa Clara form).

Pangwa. The Mountain-sheep clan of the Ala (Horn) phratry of the Hopi.

Pa'n-wa.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 38, 1891.

Panhkawashtake ('Ponca peacemakers'). The 10th Osage gens, the third on the right or Hangka side of the tribal circle, one of the original Osage fireplaces (Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 234, 1897). Its subgentes are Tsewadhe, Washape, Wakedhe, Wasetsi, and Khundtse.

Na'pasta.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883. Na'pastaqtsai.—Ibid. Pañ'ka waata'qe.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 234, 1897.

Pani. A slave of Indian race. According to Hamilton (quoted by Hale in Proc. Can. Inst., n. s., I, 23, 1897), "Pani and Pawnee are undoubtedly the same word in different orthographies," the Pawnee being the tribe from whom the Algonquian and other Indians of the great lakes and the middle west obtained their slaves. It is thought by some that the Pawnee (q. v.) received their name from this fact; but Dunbar believes that Pawnee is derived from paríki, signifying 'horn' in the language of these Indians. Cuoq says: "As most of the Indian slaves belonged to the nation of the Panis (English Pawnees), the name panis (pawnee) was given in the last [18th] century to every Indian reduced to servitude." In the literature of the 17th and 18th centuries relating to Canada and the W. the word appears as pawnee, pannee, pani, and in other forms. See also Hamilton, Slavery in Canada, Trans. Can. Inst., I, 102, 1889-90. (A. F. C.)

Panieto. A pueblo of either the Tigua or the Tewa of New Mexico about the close of the 16th century.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., XVI, 102, 1871.

Panisee. An Indian medicine-man or shaman. The word is used by Whittier (Bridal of Pennacook) after Hubbard and Winslow. The former makes panisee a synonym of powah or powow in the language of the Algonquian tribes of New England. (A. F. C.)

Panit (Ja'-nit). A former Alsea village on the s. side of Alsea r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Panka ('Ponca'). A division of the Kansa tribe.—Dorsey in Am. Nat., 671, July 1885.

Pannee. See Pani.

Panquechin.—Can. Ind. Aff. Rep., 66, 1902. Pank-weshin.—Ibid., 306, 1879.

Panthe. A former Choctaw town, noted in 1775 by Romans, by whom it was erroneously located, its position having evidently been transposed with that of Coosha (q. v.). It was at the head of Ponta cr., Lauderdale co., Miss. This town and Coosha were collectively known as the Coosha towns.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 416, 1902.

Pante.—Romans, Florida, 306, 1775.

Paor. A province on the e. side of ancient Florida, near Chicora; seen by Ayllon in 1520.—Barcia, Ensayo, 5, 1723.

Paonites. An unidentified tribe, living probably in Texas in 1690, said to be at war with the inhabitants of Toho or Teao village. Mentioned in the testimony concerning the death of La Salle, by the French captives, Pierre and Jean Talion. See Margry, Déc., III, 612, 1878.

Pamerlaunans.—Ibid.

Papago (from papáh 'beans', dotam 'people'; 'beansmen,' 'bean-people' (Kino, 1701, in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 360, 1856; McGee in Coville and Macdougall, Des. Bot. Lab., 1903); hence Span. Frijoleros. The name is often erroneously connected with 'cut-hair,' 'baptized,' etc.). A Piman tribe, closely allied to the Pima, whose original home was the territory s. and s. e. of Gila r., especially s. of Tucson, Ariz., in the main and tributary valleys of the Rio Santa Cruz, and extending w. and s. w. across the desert waste known as the Papaguería, into Sonora, Mexico. From San Xavier del Bac to Quitovaquita, one of their westernmost rancherias, it is about 120 m., and this may be considered as the extent of the settlements in the 17th and 18th centuries, during which period, owing to the inhospitality of their habitat, they were less inclined to village life than the Pima. Like the latter, the Papago subsist by agriculture, maize, beans, and cotton formerly being their chief crops, which they cultivated by means of irrigation; but many desert plants also contribute to their food supply, especially mesquite, the beans of which are eaten, and the saguaro, pitahaya, or giant cactus (Cereus giganteus), from the fruit of which preserves and a sirup are made. An extensive trade in salt, taken from the great inland lagoons, was formerly conducted by the tribe, the product finding ready sale at Tubac and Tucson. Their present principal crops are wheat and barley. They are also stock-raisers; and in recent years many of them have gained a livelihood by working as laborers, especially on railroads and irrigation ditches. The Papago are tall and dark-complexioned; their dialect differs but little from that of the Pima, and their habits and customs are generally similar except that the men wear the hair only to the shoulders. Their traditions also bear close resemblance save where varied by local coloring. Like the Pima, the Papago women are expert basket makers. Their pottery is far inferior to that of the Pueblos, and the designs and patterns of both the pottery and the basketry are the same as those of the Pima. One of their favorite games, played with 4 sticks, was that known as kints (Spanish quince, 'fifteen'), called by them ghin-skoot (probably derived from the same word).

PAPAGO OF SAN XAVIER, ARIZONA. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

From early times the Papago have been known as a frugal and peaceable people, although they by no means lacked bravery when oppressed by their enemies, the Apache, from whose raids they suffered severely. Their typical dwelling is dome shaped, consisting of a framework of saplings, thatched with grass or leafy shrubs, with an adjacent shelter or ramada. These lodges are from 12 to 20 ft in diameter, and sometimes the roof is flattened and covered with earth.

The Papago in the U. S. numbered 4,981 in 1906, distributed as follows: Under the Pima school superintendent (Gila Bend res.), 2,233; under the farmer at San Xavier (Papago res.), 523 allottees on reserve, and 2,225 in Pima co. In addition, 859 Papago were officially reported in Sonora, Mexico, in 1900, but this is probably a low estimate of their true number in that state.

The Papago subdivisions and settlements, so far as known, are: Acachin, Alcalde, Ana, Anicam, Areitorae, Ati, Babasaqui, Bacapa, Baipia, Bajio, Batequi, Baco del Arroyo, Caborca, Caca Chimir, Cahuabi, Canoa, Casca, Charco, Chioro, Chuba, Coca, Comohuabi, Cops, Cubac, Cuitciabaqui, Cuitoat, Cujant, Cumaro, Elogio, Fresnal, Guadalupe, Gubo, Juajona, Junostaca, Macombo, Mesquite, Milpais, Nariz, Oapars, Ocaboia, Oiaur, Onia, Ooltan, Otean, Perigua, Perinimo, Piatto, Poso Blanco, Poso Verde, Purificación (?), Quitovaquita, Raton, San Bonifacius, San Cosme, Sand Papago, San Ignacio (?), San Lazaro, San Luis Babi (?), San Martin, San Rafael, Santa Barbara (?), Santa Rosa, Saric (?), Saucita, Shuuk, Sierra Blanca, Soba, Sonoita, Tachilta, Tacquison, Tecolote, Tubasa, Tubutama, Valle, Zuñiga. Papajichic.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894. Papajichic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864.

Papakeecha ('flat belly', i. e. a bed-bug). A Miami chief whose village, commonly known as Flat Belly's Village, was E. of Turkey lake, at the present Indian Village, Noble co., Ind. (J. P. D.)

Flat Belly's Village.—Mississinewa treaty (1826) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 495, 1873. Pa-hed-ke-teh-a Village.—Hough, map in Ind. Geol. Rep., 1882 (misprint). Pá-pá-kēō'-cha.—J. P. Dunn, inf'n, 1907.

Papanacas. A former tribe of N. E. Mexico or S. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, members of which were gathered into San Bernardo mission in Coahuila.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864. See Paachiqui, Pacuáchium.

Papasquiario. A former Tepehuane pueblo in W. Durango, Mexico, on the S. branch of Rio Nazas, probably on the site of the present Santiago. It was the seat of a Jesuit mission founded by Geronimo Ramirez in 1596, but was abandoned in 1616 on account of Toboso raids, and was subsequently temporarily repeopled with Eudeve.

Santiago Papasquiario.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

Papiak (Pápiāk). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. B. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Papigochic ('snipe town.'—Froebel). A former Tarahumare settlement on the site of the present Villa de la Concepción, on the upper Rio Papigochi, in S. W. Chihuahua, Mexico, about lat. 28° 45', lon. 108° 30'.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864.

Papinachois (Opápinagua, 'they cause you to laugh.'—Hewitt). A Montagnais tribe or division living in the 17th century about the headwaters of Papinachois r., N. of the Bersiamite. They visited Tadoussac and received religious instruction from the missionaries, and by 1664 the latter had penetrated their country, finding them tractable and inoffensive. Charlevoix believed that this and other tribes of the same section had become extinct in his day. As late as 1721 they joined in a letter to the governor of Massachusetts.

Chauvignerie mentions a people of the same name living n. of L. Superior in 1736, numbering 20 warriors and having the hare as their totem, but these were a distinct people. (J. M.)

Papiscone. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the n. bank of the Rappahannock, in King George co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Papka. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the n. shore of Kuskokwim bay, Alaska.

Pápkamut.—Spurr and Post quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902 (mut=miut, 'people').

Pappoose. An Indian infant, a child; written also papoose. Roger Williams (1643) gives papoos as the word for child in the Narraganset dialect of Algonquian; Wood (1634) has pappouse; Eliot uses for child or infant peisses, and Trumbull (Words derived from Ind. Languages, 27, 1872) thinks that pappoose may be derived from papeisses, a reduplicative of peisses. Eliot also has papeississu, 'he is very small.' On the origin of the word Mr W. R. Gerard (inf'n, 1907) says: "The infantine utterances papa and mama are very widely distributed the world over; and it is not improbable that papu was the Narraganset infant's way of uttering the syllables that in the mouths of most infants are heard as pápa. To this the Indians may have added the diminutive suffix -es, making papúes, and used the word as the name for a little child. Papúes comes very near in sound to papoose, a word which cannot be referred to any known Algonquian root. There is a curious resemblance between the word and the Latin púpus, 'child'. The word has become widely known and applied. Burton (Highlands of the Brazil), in speaking of the young of the tapir, says: 'and the calf [is called] Tapy'ra Curumim Ocu, Papoose of the big Tapir.' Peter Smith, in his Medical Facts (1813), applied it to the root of Caulophyllum thalictroides, the blue cohosh, because it was used by Indian women to facilitate parturition. The word has also been used as a verb, thus, Winthrop (Canoe and Saddle, 1862) has: 'This fashionable [infant] was papoosed in a tight-swathing wicker-work case.'" The word pappoose has been carried by whitesettlers to the extreme W., and has found lodgment in local varieties of the Chinook jargon. From pappoose have been named pappoose frame, an Indian cradle, and pappoose root, the blue cohosh (Caulophyllum thalictroides). (A. F. C.)

Paraje (Span.: 'place,' 'residence'). A former summer village of the Laguna Indians, now a permanently occupied pueblo of that tribe, situated 6 m. n. nw. of Laguna, Valencia co., N. Mex. Native name, Tsimuná, referring to a black hill near by.

Paraje.—Pradt quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthropol., iv, 846, 1891. Paraji.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1903, 514, 1904. See-mun-ah.—Pradt, op. cit. Tsimuná.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895.

Paraniguts (Pa-ran'-i-guts, 'people of the marshy spring'). A Paiute band formerly living in the valley of the same name in s. e. Nevada; pop. 171 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Pah Ranagats.—Head in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1867, 174, 1868. Pah-rán-nè.—Whipple in Pac. R. R. Rep., III, pt. 3, 16, 1854. Pah-Reneg-Utes.—Sale in Ind. Aff. Rep., 153, 1865. Paranagats.—Gatschet in Wheeler Surv. Rep., VII, 410, 1879.

Parantones. A tribe of which 21 were reported in 1794 at Espiritu Santo de Zúñiga mission, Texas, by Fr. Juan José Aguilar. They were with Jaranames (Aranames), Tamiques, Prietos, Brazos largos, Vende flechas, and Gumpusas, all of which were said to have been subtribes of the Jaranames (Portillo, Apuntes para la Hist. Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 308, 1888). (H. E. B.)

Parathees. Given by Ker (Travels, 113, 1816) as the name of a tribe living apparently on Red r., n. w. Texas. Not identifiable and probably mythical.

Parchaque. A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, mentioned in 1675 by Fernando del Bosque. They, with the Catujanos, Tilijaes, and Apes, are said to have occupied the country n. e. from Monclova across the Rio Grande (Exped., in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 347, 1903). They were mentioned by Massanet in 1690 in his list of tribes, and in 1691 were said by him to have lived between the Sabinas and the Rio Grande. On his expedition to the Hasinai country from San Salvador del Valle de Santiago, he met them about 10 leagues s. of the Rio Grande. They, with Mescaleros, Yoricas, Chomes, Alachomes, and Pamais (Pamayes?) accompanied the Spanish party several days. Massanet said they were wanderers, without agriculture, living on buffalo meat and wild products. Some words of these tribes Massanet recorded; thus, asaguan meant 'heart,' and ganapetuan, their name for the Rio Grande, meant 'large body of water' (Diario, 1691, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 90, MS.; Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, ibid., 183).

Pachaca.—Mammet, 1691, op. cit.

Parched Corn Indians. A name indefinitely applied. "In most of our American colonies there yet remain a few of the natives, who formerly inhabited those extensive countries . . . We call them 'Parched-corn-Indians,' because they chiefly use it for bread, are civilized and live mostly by planting."—Adair, Am. Inds., 343, 1775.

Parhinas. Mentioned by Rivera (Diario, leg. 2602, 1736) as a tribe or village apparently near the lower Rio Grande in a Texas. Probably Coahuiltecan.

Parflèche (pron. par'-flesh). The ordinary skin box of the Plains and Rocky mtn. tribes, made of stiff-dressed rawhide from which the hair has been removed. It is usually of rectangular shape, varying from 2 by 3 ft in size for the largest boxes—used as clothes trunks, for storing food, etc.—to small pouches for holding paints, mirrors, or other toilet articles. Those used for storing clothing are made in pairs, two to each bed in the tipi, by trimming the rawhide to proper form while still pliable, folding over the edges upon each other, and fastening them in place by means of strings of skins passed through holes near the sides. The surface is painted with designs in various colors, and at times a fringe is added. Round boxes, somewhat resembling a quiver in shape, are made of the same material for holding feathers and decorative war-bonnets. In other sections baskets of various kinds, boxes of bark or matting, or bags of grass or soft-dressed skin, took the place of parflèche. The word is of doubtful origin, but as commonly spelled appears in French narratives as early as 1700, and is probably from some old French root, possibly from parrr 'to parry,' flèche 'arrow,' in reference originally to the shield or body-armor of rawhide. See Boxes and Chests, Rawhide, Receptacles, Skin-dressing. (J. M.)

Parisear. One of the four divisions of the Crow tribe, according to Lewis and Clark.

Pa-ree-sar.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 40, 1806; Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, vi, 108, 1805.

Parka. A dress of bird or seal skin worn as an outside garment by the Eskimo of the N. W. coast of America; from the name of this article in the Aleut dialect of the Eskimo language. (A. F. C.)

Parkeenaum (Par-kee-na-um, 'water people'). Given by Neighbors (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, ii, 127, 1852) as a division of the Comanche. The name, which is not recognized by the Comanche, may possibly have been intended for Pagatsu, q. v.

Parker, Eli Samuel. A mixed-blood Seneca of the Wolf clan, son of Chief William Parker and grandson of the celebrated Red Jacket; born on the Tonawanda res., N. Y., in 1828. His Seneca name was Hasanoanda, 'Coming to the Front,' but on receiving the official title Deionin'hogä'wë" ('it holds the door open'), when he became eighth chief of the tribe, he laid the other aside. Parker was educated in the common schools, studied civil engineering, and at the outbreak of the Civil War was employed as engineer on a Government building at Galena, Ill., then the home of Ulysses S. Grant. A friendship sprung up between the two which continued after both joined the Union Army at the outbreak of the Civil War. Parker's distinguished service in the Vicksburg campaign led to his selection by Grant as a member of his staff. In May, 1863, he became assistant adjutant-general, with the rank of captain, and was afterward secretary to Gen. Grant until the close of the war. On Apr. 9, 1865, he became brigadier-general of volunteers; in 1866, a first lieutenant of cavalry in the United States Army, and on Mar. 2, 1867, captain, major, lieutenant-colonel, and brigadier-general. By reason of their intimate relations, as well as of Parker's excellent handwriting, Grant intrusted him while his secretary with both his personal and official correspondence. It was thus that at Lee's surrender Parker engrossed the articles of capitulation that were signed by Grant and accepted by the Confederate general. Parker resigned from the Army in 1869 to accept from President Grant an appointment as Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He retired from public life in 1871, and practised his profession until his death, at Fairfield, Conn., Aug. 21, 1895. General Parker was an intimate friend of Lewis H. Morgan, the ethnologist, and his efficient coworker in preparing his "League of the Iroquois," first published in 1851. "The recognized authority and value of this book are due to the work of Parker, as well as to that of Morgan. As a sachem Parker had full knowledge of the institutions of his people, and as a man of education and culture he had both the interest and ability necessary to make those institutions known to civilized man as no ordinary interpreter could have done." Parker had a sister, Miss Caroline G. Parker (Gahano, 'Hanging Flower'), and a younger brother, Nicholas, both of whom the General survived. Miss Parker (sometimes, without reason, referred to as "Queen of the Senecas") married John Mountpleasant, a Tuscarora. Consult Morgan, League of the Iroquois, a new edition edited and annotated by Herbert M. Lloyd, New York, 1904.

Parker, Quana (from Comanche kwaina, 'fragrant,' joined to his mother's family name). The principal chief of the Comanche, son of a Comanche chief and a white captive woman. His father, Nokoni, 'wanderer,' was the leader of the Kwahadi division, the wildest and most hostile portion of the tribe and the most inveterate raiders along the Texas border. In one of the incursions, in the summer of 1835, the Comanche attacked a small settlement on Navasota r., in E. Texas, known from its founder as Parker's Fort, and carried off 2 children of Parker himself, one of whom, Cynthia Ann Parker, then about 12 years of age, became later the wife of the chief and the mother of Quana, born about 1845. The mother, with a younger infant, was afterward rescued by the troops and brought back to Texas, where both soon died. Quana grew up with the tribe, and on the death of his father rapidly rose to commanding influence. The Kwahadi band refused to enter into the Medicine Lodge treaty of 1867, by which the Comanche, Kiowa Apache, Cheyenne, and Arapaho were assigned to reservations, and continued to be a disturbing element until 1874, when, in consequence of the depredations of an organized company of white buffalo hunters, Quana himself mustered the warriors of the Comanche and Cheyenne, with about half the Kiowa and some portion of the other two tribes, for resistance. The campaign began June 24, 1874, with an attack led by Quana in person at the head of 700 confederate warriors against the buffalo hunters, who were strongly intrenched in a fort known as the Adobe Walls, on the South Canadian in the Texas panhandle. In addition to the protection afforded by the thick walls, the white hunters had a small field-piece which they used with such good effect that after a siege lasting all day the Indians were obliged to retire with considerable loss. The war thus begun continued along the whole border s. of Kansas until about the middle of the next year, when, being hard pressed by the troops under Gen. Mackenzie, most of the hostiles surrendered. Quana, however, kept his band out upon the Staked plain for 2 years longer, when he also came in. Recognizing the inevitable, he set about making the best of the new conditions, and being still young and with the inherited intelligence of his white ancestry, he quickly adapted himself so well to the white man's road as to become a most efficient factor in leading his people up to civilization. Through his influence the confederated tribes adopted the policy of leasing the surplus pasture lands, by which a large annual income was added to their revenues. He has popularized education, encouraged house building and agriculture, and discouraged dissipation and savage extravagances, while holding strictly to his native beliefs and ceremonies. Polygamy being customary in his tribe, he has several wives and a number of children, all of whom, of proper age, have received a school education, and one or two of whom have married white men. For nearly 30 years he has been the most prominent and influential figure among the 3 confederated tribes in all leases, treaty negotiations, and other public business with the Government, and in this capacity has made repeated visits to Washington, besides having traveled extensively in other parts of the country. Besides his native language he speaks both English and Spanish fairly well. He now lives in a large and comfortable house, surrounded by well-cultivated fields, about 12 m. w. of Ft Sill, Okla. Quanah, a town in N. Texas, was named in his honor. (J. M.)

Partocac. A Chumashan village w. of Pueblo de las Canoas (San Buenaventura), Ventura co., Cal., in 1542. Placed by Taylor at the Indian cemetery on the mesa of the Goleta farm.

Paltocac.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.

Parumpaiats (Pa-room'-pai-ats, 'people of the meadows'). A Paiute band formerly in or near Moapa valley, s. E. Nev.; pop. 35 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Parumpats (Pa-room'-pats). A Paiute band formerly at Parum spring, s. E. Nev.; pop. 56 in 1873, including the Nogwats.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Pasakunamon (Pā-sa-kun-ā'-mon, 'pulling corn,' according to Morgan; but properly pakunemen, 'pulling by hand' and referring to corn or anything else inanimate.—Gerard). A sub-clan of the Delawares.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Pasalves. A former tribe of n. e. Mexico or s. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, members of which were gathered into Nuestra Señora de los Dolores de la Punta mission, at Lampazos, n. Nuevo Leon.

Pasalves.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864. Pastalve.—Massanet (1690) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS. cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906.

Pasara. Given as a Karok village on Klamath r., Cal., inhabited in 1860.

Pas-see-roo.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 23, 1860.

Pasaughtacock. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the n. bank of York r., in King and Queen co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Pascagoula (Choctaw: 'bread people', from piska 'bread,' okla 'people'). A small tribe of Indians formerly living on Pascagoula r. in s. Mississippi, in intimate connection with the Biloxi, but now extinct as a separate division. As no vocabulary of their language has been preserved, nor their own tribal name, their ethnic relations are conjectural; but from their intimate connection from 1699 to the 19th century with the Biloxi, it is possible that they were Siouan.

The first mention of them is that of Iberville in 1699 (Margry, Déc., iv, 193, 1880), who refers to the village of the Bilocchy (Biloxi), Pascoboula (Pascagoula), and Mactobi, to reach which from Biloxi bay took 2½ days. There were really three villages, and a little farther on (ibid., 195), he speaks of the three as being on Pascagoula r., a short distance apart. As the three together, according to Sauvole (ibid., 451), did not contain more than 20 cabins, the estimate of 100 families is ample. About 1764, in company with the Biloxi and several other tribes, they determined to leave the neighborhood of Mobile, and in 1784 were found settled on the e. side of the Mississippi, 10 m. above the village of the Tunica. Together with the neighboring Biloxi they were estimated at 20 warriors, probably about 75 souls. Before 1791, however, they had moved up Red r. and settled at the confluence of that stream with Bayou Rigolet du Bon Dieu. The name of their chief at that time was Du Blanc. About 1795 they sold their lands here to Miller and Fulton, and followed the Biloxi to Bayou Boeuf, settling between them and the Choctaw. Later they sold these lands to the same parties, the sale being confirmed by the United States in 1805, but probably continued to reside in the neighborhood, where they died off or became incorporated with the Biloxi and Choctaw. Morse in 1822 enumerated three distinct bands of Pascagoula, two on Red r. and a third on a branch of the Neches, aggregating 240 souls; but probably some mistake was made, as the Biloxi are given as numbering only 70. (A. S. G. J. R. S.)

Pā-sha'-ga-sa-wis-so-uk.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 170, 1877. Pecagesiwag.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906 (correct form; c = sh).

Pasharanack (apparently peshartnāk, 'near the cove, or bay.'—Gerard). A village of the Abnaki in 1616, probably on the coast of Maine.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., vi, 107, 1837.

Pashashe. A Cholovone village e. of lower San Joaquin r., Cal.—Pinart, Cholovone MS., B. A. E., 1880.

Pashashebo (Montagnais: pāshashibu, 'swollen river.'—Gerard). A Montagnais village on the n. shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.—Stearns, Labrador, 271, 1884.

Pashipaho (Pāshīpahowa, 'He touches lightly in passing.'—W. J.). A prominent Sauk chief, belonging to one of the Fish clans, whose name is usually but improperly translated "Stabber." He was born about 1760, and first came into public notice when he signed, as principal chief of the Sauk, the treaty of St. Louis, Mo., Nov. 3, 1804, by which the allied Sauk and Foxes ceded to the United States their lands in Illinois and Wisconsin. This was the treaty repudiated by Black Hawk and which ultimately brought on the so-called Black Hawk war of 1832. Little is known of Pashipaho's career as a warrior, but it is probable that he was highly regarded by his tribesmen as a fighting man, for it was under his leadership that the Iowa were defeated in a decisive battle on Des Moines r. in May 1823, in which engagement Black Hawk was second in command. He was also the leader in the plot to destroy Ft Madison, Iowa, in 1809, an effort that failed because the whites were forewarned. He is said to have been vindictive and implacable in his resentments, on one occasion undertaking a long journey for the purpose of killing the Indian agent at Prairie du Chien, Wis., because the latter had offended him; but his attempt was thwarted by Taimah. Pashipaho supported Keokuk in opposing Black Hawk's war against the whites, and took no part in it. In addition to signing the St Louis treaty of 1804, he was a leading participant in negotiating subsequent treaties with the United States at Ft Armstrong, Rock Island, Ill., Sept. 3, 1822; Washington, D. C., Aug. 4, 1824, and Ft Armstrong, Sept. 21, 1832. Pashipaho was again at Ft Armstrong in Aug. 1833, on the occasion of the liberation of Black Hawk and his companions, when in a speech he advocated the peace policy of Keokuk, remarking that at one time he had taken prisoner the "great chief of the Osages," but had voluntarily released him. While in Washington, Pashipaho's portrait was painted by Charles B. King for the Indian gallery of the War Department, and is reproduced in McKenney and Hall's Indian Tribes; ten years later his portrait was again painted by George Catlin. Mention is made of Pashipaho's presence with other Sauk and Fox chiefs in camp on Des Moines r. in 1841, when news of a massacre of some of their people by the Sioux was received. Although Keokuk was present, and Pashipaho was then so old that he had to be aided in mounting his horse, the latter led the pursuit of the marauders. It is probable that his death occurred not long thereafter, though but little is known of his last years other than that he was much given to intemperate habits. He moved with his people to their reservation in Kansas. Other recorded forms of the name are Pahshapaha, Pasheparho, Pashepawko, Pashepiho, and Pushee Paho. (C. T.)

Pashir. The Water-pebble clan of the Tigua pueblo of Isleta, N. Mex.

P'áshir-t'áinín.—Lummis quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 352, 1896 (t'áinín = 'people').

Pashka. A former Modoc settlement on the N. W. shore of Tule or Rhett lake, S. W. Oreg.

Páshya.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxxii, 1890. Páshyanuash.—Ibid. (name of people). Pásya.—Ibid. Páshyanuash.—Ibid., xxxiv (name of people).

Pasinogna. A former Gabrieleño rancharia in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later called Rancho del Chino.

Pasinog-na.—Ried (1852) quoted by Hoffman in Bull. Essex Inst., xvii, 2, 1885. Passinogna.—

Ried quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Pasion. A former group of Mohave rancherias on the E. bank of the Rio Colorado, below the present Ft Mohave, in Arizona, visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776.

Rancherias de la Pasion.—Garcés, Diary, 228, 416, 1900.

Paska. A Ntlakyapamuk village on or near Thompson r., Brit. Col.; pop. 17 in 1897, the last time the name appears.

Pasha.—Can. Ind. Aff., 363, 1897. Paska.—Ibid., 230, 1886.

Paskwawiniwug ('prairie people'). The Plains Cree, one of the two great subdivisions of the Cree, subdivided into Sipiwininiwug and Mamikininiwug.

Ammisk-watchee-thinyoowuc.—Franklin, Journ. to Polar Sea, I, 168, 1824. Beaver Hill Cree.—Ibid. Cree of the Prairie.—Morgan, Consang. and Affin., 286, 1871. Grandes pagnes.—Petitot, in Jour. Roy. Geog. Soc., 649, 1883. Mus-ko-tá-we-ne-wuk.—Morgan, Consang. and Affin., 286, 1871. Pask-wawiyiniwuk.—Lacombe, Dict. de la Langue des Cris, x, 1874. People of the Prairie.—Morgan, Consang. and Affin., 286, 1871. Plain Cree.—Robinson, Great Fur Land, 186, 1879. Prairie-Cree.—Petitot in Jour. Roy. Geog. Soc., 649, 1883. Prairie Indians.—Hind, Red River Exped., 151, 1860.

Pasnacanes. A tribe or subtribe living in the 18th century with the Pamaques, near the Texas coast between the Nueces and San Antonio rs. They were probably Coahuiltecan, since they were very closely related to the Pamaques, of which tribe they seem sometimes to have been regarded as a subdivision (Ynforme of the College of Querétaro to the Commissary General, 1754, MS.). In the early history of San José mission, Tacasnanes, perhaps the same, were taken there, together with Pampopas, Pastias, and Chayopines, but they soon deserted (Altamira, opinion of Feb. 27, 1750, Mem. Hist. Tex., Archivo Gen., xxviii, 140, MS.). In 1743 the Pasnacanes were being "reduced" at the Querétaran missions near San Antonio, where their kinsmen, the Pamaques, had already been gathered (Fr. Santa Ana to the Viceroy, Mar. 4, 1743, MS.). (H. E. B.)

Panacán.—Ynforme of 1754, op. cit. Pasnacanes.—Ibid., 136. Tacasnanes.—Altamira, op. cit. (identical?).

Pasos. An unidentified tribe or band having horses and living on lower Missouri r. in 1680; probably Sionan.—La Salle (ca. 1680) in Margry, Déc., II, 168, 1878.

Paspahegh. A tribe of the Powhatan confederacy that lived between Chickahominy and James rs., Va., and numbered 200 in 1608. It was with the people of this tribe that the settlers of Jamestown came into most direct contact.

Paspahegas.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 128, 1816. Paspaheghes.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 85, 1849. Paspaheghs.—Smith (1629), Va., II, 6, repr. 1819.

Paspahegh. The principal village of the Paspahegh, situated on the N. bank of James r., in Charles City co., Va. It was burned by the English in 1610.

Paspahoge.—Smith (1629), Va., II, 77, repr. 1819. Paspahogh.—Ibid., 6. Paspahigh.—Harris, Voy. and Trav., I, 836, 1705. Paspiaha.—Percy (ca. 1606) in Purchas, Pilgrimes, IV, 1687, 1626. Paspiahe.—Ibid.

Paspahogh. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, situated on the s. bank of Chickahominy r., in Charles City co., Va., above Providence Forge.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Paspikaivats (Pa-spi'-kai-vats, 'water spring mountain people'). A Paiute band formerly living near Toquerville, s. w. Utah; pop. 40 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Pasquasheck. A former Nochpeem village, probably on the e. bank of Hudson r., in Dutchess co., N. Y.

Pasquasheck.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 80, 1872. Pasquasheck.—Van der Donck (1656) quoted by Ruttenber, ibid., 72.

Pasquayah. An Assiniboin village situated where Carrot r. enters the Saskatchewan, in E. Saskatchewan, Canada. The elder Henry says that at the time of his visit, in 1775, it consisted of 30 tipis. The younger Henry (Coues, New Light, II, 470, 1897) found it in 1808, previous to the smallpox epidemic, a place of general rendezvous for different tribes.

Pasquayah.—Henry, Trav., 256, 1809. Pascoias.—Coues, New Light, II, 469, note, 1897. Peakoyac.—Jefferys, Fr. Dom. Am., pt. 1, map, 1744.

Pasquenee (seemingly a corrupt form of pasukwen 'to be close together,' + ok 'people.'—Gerard). A Weapomeioc village in 1586, on the n. shore of Albemarle sd., perhaps in Camden co., N. C. Pasqueneek.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819. Pasqueneke.—Dutch map (1621) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., I, 1856. Passaqueneek.—Lane (1586) in Smith (1629), Va., I, 87, repr. 1819. Passaqueneke.—Hakluyt, Voy. (1600), III, 312, repr. 1810. Woman's town.—Lane (1585) quoted by Hawks, N. C., I, 112, 1859. Womens towne.—Lane (1586) in Smith (1629), Va., I, 87, repr. 1819.

Pasqui. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages, probably on the South Carolina coast, visited by Ayllon in 1520.

Pasquotank. An Algonquian tribe or band living in 1700 in North Carolina on the n. shore of Albemarle sd.

Paspatank.—Lawson (1714), Hist. Car., 383, repr. 1860. Pasquotank.—Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 7, 1894.

Passaconaway. A chief of the region about Pennacook on Merrimac r. as early as 1632 (Drake, Inds. of N. Am., 278, 1880). In 1629 his daughter married Winnepurget, sachem of Saugus, as told in Whittier's "Bridal of Pennacook." His son, Wannalancet, was afterward sachem of Pennacook. According to the chronicler Hubbard, Passaconaway was "the most noted powwow and sorcerer of all the country." He formally submitted to the English in 1644, and died at a very advanced age. (A. F. C.)

Passadumkeag (probably from pasi-dämki, 'beyond the sandy beach', from pasid 'beyond', amk 'sand', ik locative.—Gerard). A Penobscot village at Nicolas id. in Penobscot r., near the present Passadumkeag, Penobscot co., Me. The village was destroyed by the English in 1723, and the inhabitants retired to Mattawamkeag.

Passadumkeag.—Vetromile, Abnakis, 22, 1866. Passadunkee.—Conf. of 1786 in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., VII, 10, 1876.

Passamaquoddy (Peskëdëmakdidi, 'plenty of pollock.'—Gatschet). A small tribe belonging to the Abnaki confederacy, but speaking nearly the same dialect as the Malecite. They formerly occupied all the region about Passamaquoddy bay and on St Croix r. and Schoodic lake, on the boundary between Maine and New Brunswick. Their principal village was Gunasquamekook, on the site of St Andrews, N. B. They were restricted by the pressure of the white settlements, and in 1866 were settled chiefly at Sebaik, near Perry, on the s. side of the bay, and on Lewis id. They had other villages at Calais, on Schoodic lake in Washington co., Me., and on St Croix r. in New Brunswick. They were estimated at about 150 in 1726, 130 in 1804, 379 in 1825, and from 400 to 500 in 1859. The Passamaquoddy and Penobscot tribes send to the Maine legislature a representative who is permitted to speak only on matters connected with the affairs of the Indian reservations (Prince in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xxxvi, 481, 1897). See Abnaki. (J. M.)

Machias Tribe.—Winthrop (1633) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., III, 292, 1856. Machies tribe.—Gyles (1726) in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 357, 1853 (applied to a part of the Passamaquoddy living on Machias r.). Passamaquoda.—Pownall (1759), ibid., v, 368, 1857. Passamaquodie.—Willis (ca. 1830), ibid., I, 27, 1866. Passamaquoda.—Pownall (1759), ibid., v, 371, 1857. Passamaquodda.—Penhallow (1726) in N. H. Hist. Soc. Coll., I, 33, 1824. Passamaquoddy.—Penhallow (1726) in N. H. Hist. Soc. Coll., I, 92, 1824. Passamaquodie.—Williamson in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., VII, 203, 1876. Passamequado.—Dudley (1704) quoted by Drake, Ind. Wars, 220, 1825. Passamaquod-dies.—Ind. Aff. Rep., app., 2, 1824. Passamaquoddies.—Macaulay, N. Y., II, 162, 1829. Passamaquoddy.—Church (1716) quoted by Drake, Ind. Wars, 200, 1825. Passimaquodies.—Trumbull, Conn., II, 64, 1818. Pennoukady.—Vaudreuil (1721) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 904, 1855. Peakadamskan.—Aubery (1720), in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 895, 1855. Peakadamukotik.—Gatschet, Penobscot MS., B. A. E., 1887 (Penobscot name). Peakadaneoukanti.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, III, 79, 1854. Peakamaquonty.—Vetromile, Abnakis, 54, 1866. Peamaquady.—Gyles (1726) in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 357, 1853. Peamocady.—Cadillac (1692), ibid., VI, 279, 1859. Peamokanti.—Abnaki letter (1721) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., VIII, 262, 1819. Pëa-ta-moka'tiük.—Chamberlain, Malecite MS., B. A. E., 1882 (Malecite name). Pestumagatiek.—Prince in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xxxvi, 479, 1897 (own name). Quaddies.—James quoted by Tanner, Narr., 327, 1830. Quaddy Indians.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 144, 1827. Quoddies.—Drake, Bk. Inds., xii, 1848. Unchechange.—Andros (1675) in N. Y.

Doc. Col. Hist., xiv, 709, 1883. Uncheekauke.—Doc. of 1677, ibid., 733. Unquechange.—Andros (1675), ibid., 695. Unshagoga.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 541, 1878. Vncheekaug.—Doc. of 1667 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xiv, 602, 1883. Vnquechauke.—Doc. of 1668, ibid., 605.

Passaunkack. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the s. bank of Mattapony r., in the n. w. part of King William co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Passayonk ('in the valley.'—Hewitt). A Delaware village on Schuylkill r., Pa., in 1648. Macauley calls the band a part of the Manta, and says that they lived along the w. bank of the lower Delaware, extending into Delaware.

Passajonck.—Beekman (1660) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xii, 310, 1877. Passajongh.—Beekman (1660), ibid., 302. Passajonk.—Macauley, N. Y., ii, 166, 1829. Passayonk.—Hudde (1648) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xii, 86, 1877. Passayunk.—Ibid., 309.

Passing Hail's Band. A band of Mdewakanton Sioux formerly living on Yellow Medicine r., Minn., and taking its name from its chief, Wasuwicaxtanxi, or Wasu-ihiyayedán, otherwise known as Bad Hail, Passing Hail, and Traveling Hail. The band numbered 193 in 1863. See Ind. Aff. Rep., 314, 1863; Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., vi, pt. 3, 386, 1894.

Passycotung. A former village of the Munsee or the Delawares, but subject to the Seneca, on Chemung r., N. Y.—Hamilton (1760) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., ix, 280, 1871.

Pastaloca. A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, met by Massanet, in 1691, at points 6 and 10 leagues s. w. of Nueces r., Texas, with Quems, Pachul, Ocana, Chaguan (Siaguan), and Paac Indians (Diario, 1691, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 92, MS.). It was evidently given in his list of 1690 and miscopied in Mem. de Nueva España (xxvii, 183) as Pastalve. In 1703 this was one of the tribes at San Bernardo mission, and in 1738 61 families of the tribe were at San Juan Bautista (Portilla, Apuntes, 283, 288, 1888). In 1720 a woman of this tribe was baptized at San Antonio de Valero mission and her name written Pastaloca and Pastoloca. In the burial record her name is entered Pastalac (Valero Bautismos, 1720, partida 76, MS.). In 1730 a daughter of two gentiles, a Papan(ac?) and a Pastalath, was baptized there. (H. E. B.)

Pastalac.—Valero Entierros, partida 249, MS. Pastaloca.—Valero Bautismos, partida 76, MS. Pastalocos.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864. Pastaluc.—Massanet, op. cit., 1691. Pastalve.—Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS. (miscopy). Pastoloca.—Valero Bautismos, partida 76, MS. Patacales.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 304, 1864 (identical?).

Pastancoyas. A tribe, probably Coahuiltecan, at San Bernardo mission, on the Rio Grande in Coahuila, in or after 1703.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864.

Pastanza. A village of the Potomac tribe of the Powhatan confederacy on or near Potomac r. in Virginia in 1608, ruled by a brother of the chief of the Potomac tribe. It may have been one of the villages on Aquia cr. in Stafford co., marked on Capt. John Smith's map but not named. (J. M.)

Paspatanzie.—Spelman (ca. 1615) misquoted by Tooker, Algonq. Ser., viii, 21, 1901. Pasptanzie.—Spelman (ca. 1615) in Smith, Va., Arber ed., civ, 1894. Pastanza.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Hist. Va., 39, 1849.

Pasteal. A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, given in Massanet's list (1690) of tribes between central Coahuila and the Hasinai country, a route most of which he had four times passed over (Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS.). The name is probably distinct from Pastalac, a synonym of Pastaloca, q. v. (H. E. B.)

Pastias.—Rivera, Diario, leg. 2602, 1736 (identical?).

Pastoliak. A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on the right bank of Pastoliak r., near the s. shore of Norton sd., Alaska; pop. 80 in 1880.

Pastoliak.—Tebenkof (1849) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 490, 1906. Pastoliakh.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 11, 1884.

Pastoligmint. A subdivision of the Unaligmint Eskimo of Alaska, formerly camping at the head of Pastolik bay.

Paschtoligmenten.—Wrangell quoted by Richardson, Arct. Exped., i, 370, 1851. Paschtoligmjuten.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., 6, 1855. Paschtoligmüten.—Wrangell, Nachr., 122, 1839. Paschtuligmüten.—Ibid. Pashtolegmütis.—Latham (1845) in Jour. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., 183, 1848. Pashtolits.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 529, 1878. Pastoligmüt.—Holmberg quoted by Dall, Alaska, 407, 1870.

Pastolik. A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on Pastolik r., Alaska; pop. 113 in 1890.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

Pashtolik.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850. Paschtolik.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855. Pastólik.—Dall, Alaska, 236, 1870.

Pasukdhin ('village on a hilltop'). An ancient village of the Osage. The name was afterward given to a settlement of the Pahatsi, or Great Osage, on Verdigris r., Okla. In 1850, when visited by De Smet, it numbered 600 souls.

Bif-hill.—De Smet, W. Miss., 355, 1856 (misprint). Big Hills.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 470, 1878. Passei-Ougrin.—De Smet, op. cit. gasugria.—Dorsey Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883. Pasukdhi.—Ibid.

Pasulin (Pasúlin, 'village on a hilltop'). A former village on Kansas r., occupied about 1820 by the Kansa, when the tribe had 4 villages. (J. O. D.)

Pataguo. A Coahuiltecan tribe, first mentioned by Massanet, Nov. 16, 1690, in his list of tribes met between the presidio of Coahuila and the Hasinai country of Texas. The tribes were given in the list in geographical order, and the indication is that this tribe then lived n. e. of the Rio Grande (Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS.). This view is supported by the fact that in 1691 Massanet found the tribe at Rio Hondo, 11 leagues n. e. of the Rio Nueces. They were with Indians of the "Sanpanal, Patchal, Papañaca, Parchiquis, Pacuáchiam, Aguapálam, Samampác, Vánca, and Payaván" tribes (ibid., 94). One of these is in García's list of Coahuiltecan tribes (1760), and Massanet records the statement that the language of this country was the same (i. e. Coahuiltecan) all the way from his starting point to beyond San Antonio r. (ibid., 98; and Espinosa, Diario, May 8, 1716). In 1716 Ramón and Espinosa found three rancherías of the tribe in the same locality (Derrotero, 1691, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 145, MS.). Members of this tribe were baptized at San Francisco Solano mission after 1704 (Valero Bautismos), where they frequently intermarried with the Xarames, and between 1720 and 1763 numbers of them were at San Antonio de Valero (ibid., passim). In 1738 Lorenzo, a Pataguo, was "governor" of this mission (Testimony, June 3, 1738, in Archivo Gen., Yndiferente de Guerra, 1736-37, fol. 88, MS.). In their gentile state they intermarried with the Payayas and Patzaus (Valero Casamientos, partidas 128, 157, MS.). (H. E. B.)

Pachajuan.—Valero Entierros, partida 267, 1739, MS. (identical?). Patagahan.—Ibid., partida 255, 1739. Patagahu.—Ibid., 1739. Patagua.—Espinosa, Diario, 1716, MS. in Archivo Gen. Pataguan.—Valero Casamientos, 1716, partida 9, MS. Patague.—Valero Entierros, 1704, partida 25. Pataguita.—Morfi, Hist., ca. 1781, MS. (identical?). Pataguakes.—Hernando del Bosque, Exped., 1675, in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 343, 1903 (identical?). Patague.—Valero Bautismos, 1728, partida 220. Patavo.—Massanet, Nov. 16, 1690, cited in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS.

Pataheuhah. Given by Schoolcraft (Ind. Tribes, iii, 612, 1853) as a former village of the Mdewakanton Sioux, with 229 inhabitants, on Minnesota r., 25 m. from the agency in Minnesota; perhaps that of Chetanduta, 'Scarlet hawk,' chief of the Tintaotonwe.

Patakeenothe (Pä-täke-e-no-the', 'rabbit'). A gens of the Shawnee.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 168, 1877.

Patameragouche. Given by Alcedo (Dic. Geog., iv, 117, 1788) as an Indian [Micmac] village on the e. coast of Nova Scotia, near Canso str. Not identified.

Pataotrey. A large village of the Jumanó in New Mexico in 1598; doubtless situated in the region of Abo, e. of the Rio Grande.

Pataotrey.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871. Patases.—Ibid., 123 (believed by Bandelier to be probably identical).

Pataquilla. A ranchería near the presidio of La Bahía and the mission of Espíritu Santo de Zúñiga, on the lower Rio San Antonio, Tex., in 1785, at which date it contained only 3 inhabitants (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 659, 1886).

Its people were possibly of Karankawan or Coahuiltecan affinity. Cf. Pastaloca.

Pataunck. A tribe or subtribe of the Powhatan confederacy on Pamunkey r., Va., numbering about 400 in 1612.—Strachey, Va., 62, 1849.

Patchoag ('where they divide in two,' referring to two streams forming one river.—Trumbull). A tribe on the s. coast of Long id., N. Y., extending from Patchogue to Westhampton. Besides their principal village, bearing the same name, they had others at Fireplace, Mastic, Moriches, and Westhampton. The Cannetquot Indians were a part of this tribe. The survivors are known as Poosepatuck, q. v.

Patchoag. The principal village of the Patchoag, near the present Patchogue, Suffolk co., Long id., N. Y.

Onchechang.—Patent of 1680 quoted by Thompson, Long Id., i, 418, 1843. Pachough.—Ruttenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 81, 1906. Patchague.—Wood in Macauley, N. Y., ii, 252, 1829. Patchogue.—Ibid. Pochoug.—Writer of 1752 quoted by Thompson, Long Id., i, 414, 1843. Pochougha.—Ruttenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 81, 1906. Unachog.—James quoted by Tanner, Narr., 328, 1830. Unachage.—Deed of 1664 quoted by Thompson, Long Id., i, 410, 1843. Unquashog.—Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 74, 1881 (trans. uhque-adchuk, 'end of a mountain'). Vnechechange.—Doc. of 1676 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xiv, 717, 1883.

Patha ('beaver'). An Oto gens.

Beaver.—Dorsey, Tciwere MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1879. Pa-qa'.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897.

Path Killer (corrupted translation of Núñnd'hí-dihl', 'he kills [habitually] in the path'). A former prominent Cherokee chief who signed the treaties of Tellico in 1804 and 1805, and the treaty of Turkeytown (Chickasaw Council House) in 1816. See Ridge, Major. (J. M.)

Patika. The name of two villages in n. e. Florida at the period of the French Iluguenot occupancy in 1564. One was on the coast, 8 leagues s. of Ft Caroline, which stood near the mouth of St John r.; its chief was friendly with the French and was probably of the Saturiba, or possibly of the Timucua tribe. The other village was on the w. bank of St John r., apparently about midway between the present Jacksonville and Palatka, and probably belonged to the Timucua. It appears on the De Bry map of 1591 as Patchica. Bartram mentions the "Patikas," with "Yamasees," "Utinas," and others, as early enemies to the Carolina colony until their strength was broken by the Creeks. (J. M.)

Patchica.—De Bry, map (1591) in Le Moyne, Narr., Appleton trans., 1875 (on St John r.). Patika.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 275, 1869 (used for both villages). Patikas.—Bartram, Trav., 54, 1792. Patikos.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 98, 1855.

Patiri. An unidentified tribe given by Morfi (Hist. Tex., bk. II, ca. 1781, MS.) in his list of Texas tribes.

Patki. The Cloud or Water-house phratry of the Hopi, which comprises the following clans: Patki, Kau (Corn), Omowuh (Rain-cloud), Tangaka (Rainbow), Talawipiki (Lightning), Kwan (Agave), Sivwapi (Bigelovia graveolens), Pawikya (Aquatic animal [Duck]), Pakwa (Frog), Pavatiya (Small aquatic creatures), Murzibusi (Bean), Kawaibatunya (Watermelon), and Yoki (Rain). This people claims to have come from the great-cactus region in the "red land of the south," called by them Palátkwabi. The Water-house phratry of Fewkes and the Rain (Yoki) phratry of Stephen are identical.

Pat-ki-nyû-mû.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., VII, 402, 1894 (nyû-mû = 'phratry'). Yo'-ki.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 89, 1891.

Patki. The Cloud or Water-house clan of the Patki phratry of the Hopi.

Batki.—Dorsey and Voth, Mishongnovi Ceremonies, 175, 1902. Batkiñyamu.—Ibid. Pa'jeh.—Bourke, Snake Dance, 117, 1884. Patki wiñwû.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1901 (wiñwû = 'clan'). Pat'-ki wûñ-wû.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., VII, 402, 1894.

Patnetac. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Pato. A town between Aguacay and Amaye, w. of the Mississippi, probably in the present Clark co., Ark.; visited by Moscoso's troops, after De Soto's death, in July 1542.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 195, 1850.

Patofa. A former district and town, probably Uchean, named after its chief, situated in Georgia and visited by De Soto's expedition in Apr. 1540 (Gentl. of Elvas, 1557, in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 139, 1850). If Uchean, the name is possibly related to the Yuchi term padófa, 'dark,' 'obscure' (F. G. Speck, inf'n, 1907).

Patoqua ('village of the bear'). Formerly one of the western group of Jemez pueblos, situated on a ledge of the mesa that separates Guadalupe and San Diego canyons, 6 m. N. of Jemez pueblo, N. central New Mexico. It seems to have been the seat of the Spanish mission of San Joseph de los Jemez (which contained a church as early as 1617), but was abandoned in 1622 on account of hostility of the Navaho. In 1627, however, it and Gyusiwa were resettled by Fray Martin de Arvide with the inhabitants of a number of small pueblos then occupied by the Jemez. It was permanently abandoned prior to the Pueblo revolt of 1680. The people of this pueblo claimed to have dwelt at the lagoon of San José, 75 m. N. W. of Jemez, and that they removed thence to a place between Salado and Jemez rs., where they built the pueblo of Anyukwinu. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 205, et seq., 1892; and cf. Century Cyclopaedia of Names, 1894, art. Putoqua. (F. W. H.)

Batokvá.—Loew (1875) in Wheeler Surv. Rep., VII, 343, 1879. Patoqua.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, pt. 2, 207, 1892. San Joseph de Jemez.—Bandelier (1888) in Compte-rendu Cong. Am., VII, 452, 1890. S. Josepho.—Crepay, Map Am. Sept., ca. 1783. S. Josef.—D'Anville, Map Am. Sept., 1746. S. Josefo.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. S. Josef.—D'Anville, Map N. A., Bolton's ed., 1752. St. Joseph.—Shea, Cath. Missions, 80, 1870.

Patshenin. A tribe or band formerly living with the Saponi and Tutelo under Iroquois protection on Grand r., Ontario. They probably came from the S. with those tribes, and Hale thinks they may have been the Occaneechi.

Pattali. One of the Apalachee towns mentioned in a letter of 1688 addressed by a number of Apalachee chiefs to Charles II of Spain. A facsimile of the original letter was reproduced and published by Buckingham Smith in 1860.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 76, 1884.

Patung. The Squash phratry of the Hopi, consisting of the Squash, Crane, Pigeon-hawk, and Sorrow-making clans. They claim to have come from a region in southern Arizona called Palátkwabi.

Batánga.—Voth, Trad. of Hopi, 40, 1905. Patuña.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1901.

Patung. The Squash clan of the Patung phratry of the Hopi.

Batang.—Voth, Oralbi Summer Snake Ceremony, 283, 1903. Batang-a.—Dorsey and Voth, Mishongnovi Ceremonies, 176, 1902. Patuña wiñwû.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1900 (wiñ-wû = 'clan'). Pa'-tuñ-wuñ-wû.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., VII, 402, 1894.

Patuterajut. A former settlement of the Angmagsalingmiut Eskimo of the E. coast of Greenland.—Meddelelser om Grönland, IX, 382, 1889.

Patuxent (probably related in meaning to Patuxet, q. v.). An Algonquian tribe formerly living in what is now Calvert co., Md., their principal village bearing the same name. It is probable that they were closely related to the Conoy, if not a part of them. They met the Maryland colonists, on their first arrival, on terms of friendship, which continued without serious interruption as long as the tribe existed. As early as 1639 the colonial authorities proclaimed the Patuxent as friends and declared them under the protection of the colony. In 1651 they, together with other Indians, were placed on a reservation at the head of Wicomico r. The following is an account of a religious ceremony in their temple, from the Relatio Itineris of White: "On an appointed day all the men and women of every age, from several districts, gathered together round a large fire; the younger ones stood nearest the fire, behind these stood those who were older. Then they threw deer's fat on the fire, and lifting their hands to heaven and raising their voices they cried out Yahoo! Yahoo! Then making room some one brings forward quite a large bag; in the bag is a pipe and a powder which they call Potu. The pipe is such a one as is used among us for smoking tobacco, but much larger; then the bag is carried round the fire and the boys and girls follow it, singing alternately with tolerably pleasant voices, Yahoo! Yahoo! Having completed the circuit the pipe is taken out of the bag and the powder called Potu is distributed to each one as they stand near; this is lighted in the pipe and each one drawing smoke from the pipe blows it over the several members of his body and consecrates them."

Patuxents.—Bozman, Md., II, 421, 1837. Pautuxentes.—Smith (1629), Va., I, 135, repr. 1819.

Patuxent. The principal village of the Patuxent, situated on the E. bank of Patuxent r., Md. Capt. John Smith estimated the number of warriors at 40 in 1608.

Barchuxem.—White (1634), Relatio Itineris, 41, 1874. Baroluxen.—White quoted by Shea, Cath. Miss., 487, 1856. Patuxent.—Writer of 1639 quoted in Relatio Itineris, 63, 1874. Patuxunt.—Yong (1634) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., IX, 105, 1871. Pautuxunt.—Smith (1629), Va., I, 118, repr. 1819.

Patuxet (prob. Pdtukeset, 'at the little fall.'—Gerard). A Massachusetts village on the site of Plymouth, Mass. It was depopulated by the great pestilence of 1617, which seems not to have extended much farther south.

Acaumuck.—Smith, map (ca. 1616), cited in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., III, 175, 1846 ('to go by water': used in describing a place more easily reached by water than by land). Accomaek.—Smith (1616), ibid., 3d s., VI, 108, 1837. Accoomeek.—Winthrop (ca. 1625), ibid., III, 175, 1846. Apaum.—Williams' deed (ca. 1635) in R. I. Col. Rec., I, 18, 1856 (Naraganset name). Ompaam.—Cotton (1708) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., II, 232, 1830 (Massachusetts name). Patuckset.—Pratt (1662), ibid., 4th s., IV, 480, 1858. Patuns.—Kendall, Trav., II, 45, 1819. Patuxet.—Smith (1629), Va., II, 183, repr. 1819. Patuxite.—Dermer (1620) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., III, 97, 1856. Patuyet.—Dee in Smith (1629), Va., II, 228, repr. 1819. Umpame.—Writer of 1815 in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., III, 175, 1846 (so called by Mashpee Indians).

Patwin ('man,' 'person'). A name adopted by Powers to designate a division of the Copehan family (q. v.). They occupied the area extending from Stony cr., Colusa co., to Suisun bay, Solano co., Cal., and from Sacramento r. to the boundary of the Kulanapan family on the w., but excluding the so-called Coyote Valley Indians on the headwaters of Putah cr. in the s. part of Lake co., determined by Barrett to be Moquelumnan and not Copehan. The dialects of this division differ considerably from those of the Wintun. Powers believed the Patwin were once very numerous. The manners and customs of the tribes in the interior and on the mountains differed greatly from those near the shore. On the plains and in the valleys in building a dwelling they excavated the soil for about 2 ft, banked up enough earth to keep out the water, and threw the remainder on the roof in a dome. In the mountains, where wood was more abundant and rain more frequent, no roofing of earth was used. In war the Patwin used bows and arrows and flint-pointed spears; no scalps were taken, but the victors are said often to have decapitated the most beautiful maiden they captured. They had a ceremony for "raising evil spirits" and dances to celebrate a good harvest of acorns or a successful catch of fish. The dead were usually buried, though cremation was practised to some extent by some of the tribes. For the Patwin villages, see Copehan Family.

Patchawe.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 96, 1877 (Chimariko name). Patwae.—Ibid. Patweens.—Powers in Overland Month., XIII, 543, 1874. Pat-win.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 218, 1877.

Patzau. A tribe, probably Coahuiltecan, mentioned as early as 1690 by Massanet in his list of tribes met between the presidio of Coahuila and the Hasinai country of Texas. The tribes were given in the list in geographical order, and the indication is that the Patzau then lived N. E. of the Rio Grande (Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS.). In the following year Massanet found them 11 leagues E. of Nueces r. with the Pataguos, Pachales, and others (ibid., 94). This tribe is evidently distinct from the Putzai as well as from the Pachales, but it is difficult to distinguish some of the variants of these two names. Some of the Patzau entered San Francisco Solano mission on the Rio Grande as early as 1712, and between 1723 and 1750 a number of them were baptized at San Antonio de Valero (Valero Bautismos, passim). (H. E. B.)

Paughaden. See Pauhagen.

Paugie. See Porgy.

Paugusset ('where the narrows open out.'—Trumbull). A small Algonquian tribe in Connecticut, on Housatonic r., near the mouth of the Naugatuck. Their principal village, Paugusset, was on the e. side of the river. They had a fortress on the e. bank about half a mile above the Naugatuck, and another in Milford. Ruttenber makes them a part of the Wappinger confederacy, and says they were subject to the Mattabesec. They claimed a tract on both sides of the lower Housatonic, extending up to Newtown, but sold most of their lands about 1660. Besides their principal village they had Turkey Hill Village, Pauquaunuch, Naugatuck, and Poodatook. The whole tribe numbered perhaps 700 or 800. In 1762 they had mainly retired to Scaticook, farther up the river, where the survivors then numbered 127, while about 60 were still in their old homes. Several mixed-blood families are said to survive near Bridgeport, Conn. (J. M. C. T.)

Paugwik. An Aglenniut and Unalaskan village at the mouth of Naknek r., Alaska, on the s. side. Pop. (including Kingiak) 192 in 1880, 93 in 1890.

Kennuyak.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 45, 1881. Kinuiak.—Petroff, ibid., map. Naugvik.—Sari-chef quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Pakwik.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893. Paugwik.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 17, 1884. Pawik.—Baker, op. cit. Suworof.—Ibid. Taugwik.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 45, 1881.

Pauhagen. One of the New England names of the menhaden, or mossbunker (Alosa menhaden); also a sort of mackerel bait made of chopped or ground fish. Trumbull (Natick Dict., 69, 1903) derives the word from p8kangan (pwkangan) in the Abnaki dialect of Algonquian, said to signify 'fertilizer'; but this is regarded as very doubtful by Gerard, who says the fish called by Rasles p8kangané cannot be identified. Other spellings are paughaden, poghaden, pauhaugen. See Menhaden, Pogy, Porgy. (A. F. C.)

Pauhantanuc. An Abnaki village in 1614, probably on or near the coast of Maine.

Paghuntanuck.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., vi, 107, 1837. Pauhantanuck.—Smith (1631), ibid., iii, 22, 1833.

Paukauns. See Pecan.

Paul; Little Paul. See Mazakutemani.

Pauma. A former Luisefio rancheria on San Luis Rey r., San Diego co., Cal.; pop. 106 in 1865. The name is now also applied to a reservation of 250 acres of unpatented land, with 67 inhabitants, which was under the Mission-Tule consolidated agency until 1903, when the agency was divided and Pauma placed under the Pala agency (Ind. Aff. Rep., 125, 1865; ibid., 175, 1902). The Pauma rancheria seems to have existed at least as early as 1795 (Grijalva cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 563, 1886), when it is mentioned under the form Pamua.

Palma.—Ames, Rep. Miss. Indians, 6, 1873.

Paupattokshick. A village of 15 houses on lower Thames r., in New London co., Conn., occupied in 1638 by some of the conquered Pequot assigned to the Mohegan.—Williams (1638) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., vi, 251, 1863.

Pauquaunuch. A village of the Paugusset in Stratford township, Fairfield co., Conn. It contained 25 wigwams about 1710, but before 1761 the Indians had removed up the river to Scaticook.

Golden Hill tribe.—De Forest, Inds. Conn., 49, 1853. Pauquaunuch.—Birdsey (1761) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 111, 1809. Pughquonnuck.—Trumbull, Conn., 109, 1818.

Pausanes. A Coahuiltecan tribe formerly living on San Antonio r., Texas; mentioned by García as one of the tribes speaking the language of his Manual.

Pamanes.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863. Pames.—Ibid. Pausanas.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 86, 1855. Pausanes.—García, Manual, title, 1760. Pausanes.—Doc. of 1737 cited by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 304, 1864.

Paushuk (pau-shük, 'cutthroats'). An Arikara band.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Val., 357, 1862.

Pavatiya. The Tadpole clan of the Hopi.

Pavatiya wiñwá.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 563, 1901 (wiñwá = 'clan'). Pa-va-ti-ya wüñ-wá.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., vii, 402, 1894.

Paviotso. A name applied originally by Powell to a group of small Shoshonean tribes in w. Nevada, and extended for convenience to all related bands in that region. For their names, see Mono-Paviotso.

Athlets.—Gatschet in Wheeler Surv. Rep., vii, 410, 1879. Báloh.—Powers, Inds. W. Nevada, MS., B. A. E., 1876 (Washo name). Pa'lu.—Henshaw, Washo MS. vocab., B. A. Rep. 1856, 228, 1857. Say-do-carah.—Hopkins, Life Among Piute, 75, 1882 (trans. 'conquerors' or 'enemy'). Sidocaw.—Campbell in Ind. Aff. Rep., 119, 1866. Taniyumu'h.—Powers, Inds. W. Nevada, MS., B. A. E., 1875 (own ancient name). Ti'vati'ka.—Hoffman in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xxiii, 298, 1896 (= 'pine-nut eaters').

Paviye. A rancheria, probably Cochimi, connected with Purísima (Cade-gomo) mission, Lower California, in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 189, 1857.

Pavlof. An Aleut village at Selenie pt., Pavlof bay, Alaska penin., Alaska. Pop. 59 in 1833, according to Veniaminof.

Pavloekai.—Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 225, 1876.

Pavlovak.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 35, 1884.

Pavlovakoe.—Veniaminof, Zapiski, II, 203, 1840.

Pavlovakoeje.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855.

Selenie.—Dall (1880) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902 (Russian: 'settlement').

Pavvwiwuyai (Pa-vu'-wi-wu'-yu-ai). A Pavioteo band formerly about Mammoth City, Utah.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Paw. The Water clan of the pueblo of Taos, N. Mex.

Pá-tá-lina.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1899 (tá-lina = 'people').

Pawating (Baw'ting, a cognate form of Baw'tigunk, 'at the rapids.'—W. J.). An ancient Chippewa village at Sault Ste Marie, on the s. bank of St Marys r., Chippewa co., Mich. According to Dr Wm. Jones the old village site is the most sacred spot known to the old-time Chippewa. A Chippewa who has been to the rapids has made a holy pilgrimage, because there his ancestors were created, there the manitos blessed the people, and from there was the dispersion round about L. Superior. The people, from the situation of their village, were called Saulteurs by the early French writers, and as the French became acquainted with more remote bands of Chippewa the term came to designate the whole tribe. The Jesuit mission of Sainte Marie du Sault was established at Pawating in 1669. (J. M.)

Pawcatuck. A village, probably on Pawcatuck r., Washington co., R. I., occupied in 1657 by a remnant of the conquered Pequot. Regarding the name, Trumbull (Ind. Names Conn., 48, 1881) says: "If the name belonged first to the territory—the eastern part of the Pequot country—it certainly stands for Paquat-uke, i. e. 'Pequot land'; but if, as is on the whole more probable, it belonged to the river, the first two syllables stand either for pauqua 'clear, open', or for pagwa 'shallow', and the last syllable, tuk, denotes a 'tidal river.' Yet neither analysis satisfactorily disposes of the name of Paucatuck or Pacatuck (1688) brook, in West Springfield, Mass."

Pawnee. A confederacy belonging to the Caddoan family. The name is probably derived from puriki, a horn, a term used to designate the peculiar manner of dressing the scalp-lock, by which the hair was stiffened with paint and fat, and made to stand erect and curved like a horn. This marked feature of the Pawnee gave currency to the name and its application to cognate tribes. The people called themselves Chahiksichahiks, 'men of men.'

In the general northeastwardly movement of the Caddoan tribes the Pawnee seem to have brought up the rear. Their migration was not in a compact body, but in groups, whose slow progress covered long periods of time. The Pawnee tribes finally established themselves in the valley of Platte r., Nebr., which territory, their traditions say, was acquired by conquest, but the people who were driven out are not named. It is not improbable that in making their way n. e. the Pawnee may have encountered one or more waves of the southward movements of Shoshonean and Athapascan tribes. When the Siouan tribes entered Platte valley they found the Pawnee there. The geographic arrangement always observed by the four leading Pawnee tribes may give a hint of the order of their northeastward movement, or of their grouping in their traditional southwestern home. The Skidi place was to the n. w., and they were spoken of as belonging to the upper villages; the Pitahauerat villages were always downstream; those of the Chaui, in the middle, or between the Pitahauerat and the Kitkehahki, the villages of the last-named being always upstream. How long the Pawnee resided in the Platte valley is unknown, but their stay was long enough to give new terms to 'west' and 'east,' that is, words equivalent to 'up' or 'down' that eastwardly flowing stream.

The earliest historic mention of a Pawnee is that of the so-called "Turk" (q. v.), who by his tales concerning the riches of Quivira (q. v.) allured and finally led Coronado, in 1541, from New Mexico over the plains as far as Kansas, where some Pawnee (see Harahey) visited him. The permanent villages of the tribes lay to the n. of Quivira, and it is improbable that Coronado actually entered any of them during his visit to Quivira, a name given to the Wichita territory. It is doubtful if the Apane or the Quipana mentioned in the narrative of De Soto's expedition in 1541 were the Pawnee, as the latter dwelt to the n. w. of the Spaniards' line of travel. Nor is it likely that the early French explorers visited the Pawnee villages, although they heard of them, and their locality was indicated by Tonti, La Harpe, and others. French traders, however, were established among the tribes before the middle of the 18th century.

How the term Pani (q. v.), or Pawnee, as applied to Indian slaves, came into use is not definitely known. It was a practice among the French and English in the 17th and 18th centuries to obtain from friendly tribes their captives taken in war and to sell them as slaves to white settlers. By ordinance of Apr. 13, 1709, the enslavement of negroes and Pawnee was recognized in Canada (Shea's Charlevoix, v, 224, 1871). The Pawnee do not seem to have suffered especially from this traffic, which, though lucrative, had to be abandoned on account of the animosities it engendered. The white settlers of New Mexico became familiar with the Pawnee early in the 17th century through the latter's raids for procuring horses, and for more than two centuries the Spanish authorities of that territory sought to bring about peaceful relations with them, with only partial success.

As the Pawnee villages lay in a country remote from the region contested by the Spaniards and French in the 17th and 18th centuries, these Indians escaped for a time the influences that proved so fatal to their congeners, but ever-increasing contact with the white race, in the latter part of the 18th century, introduced new diseases and brought great reduction in population together with loss of tribal power. When the Pawnee territory, through the Louisiana Purchase, passed under the control of the U. S., the Indians came in close touch with the trading center at St Louis. At that time their territory lay between the Niobrara r. on the n. and Prairie Dog cr. on the s., and was bounded on the w. by the country of the Cheyenne and Arapaho, and on the e. by that of the Omaha, on the n. of the Platte, and on the s. of the Platte by the lands of the Oto and Kansa tribes. The trail to the S. W., and later that across the continent, ran partly through Pawnee land, and the increasing travel and the settlement of the country brought about many changes. Through all the vicissitudes of the 19th century the Pawnee never made war against the U. S. On the contrary they gave many evidences of forbearance under severe provocation by waiting, under their treaty agreement, for the Government to right their wrongs, while Pawnee scouts faithfully and courageously served in the U. S. army during Indian hostilities. The history of the Pawnee has been that common to reservation life—the gradual abandonment of ancient customs and the relinquishment of homes before the pressure of white immigration.

The first treaty between the Pawnee and the U. S. was that of the several bands made at St Louis, June 18–22, 1818, when peace was concluded with all the tribes of the region disturbed by the War of 1812. By treaty of Ft Atkinson (Council Bluffs), Iowa, Sept. 28, 1825, the Pawnee acknowledged the supremacy of the U. S. and agreed to submit all grievances to the Government for adjustment. By treaty of Grand Pawnee Village, Nebr., Oct. 9, 1833, they ceded all their lands s. of Platte r. By that of Ft Childs, Nebr., Aug. 6, 1848, they sold a 60-mile strip on the Platte about Grand Island. By treaty of Table cr., Nebr., Sept. 24, 1857, all lands n. of the Platte were assigned to the Government, except a strip on Loup r. 30 m. e. and w. and 15 m. n. and s., where their reservation was established. This tract was ceded in 1876, when the tribes removed to Oklahoma, where they now live. In 1892 they took their lands in severalty and became citizens of the U. S.

The tribal organization of the Pawnee was based on village communities representing subdivisions of the tribe. Each village had its name, its shrine containing sacred objects, and its priests who had charge of the rituals and ceremonies connected with these objects; it had also its hereditary chiefs and its council composed of the chiefs and leading men. If the head chief was a man of unusual character and ability he exercised undisputed authority, settled all difficulties, and preserved social order; he was expected to give freely and was apt to be surrounded by dependents. Each chief had his own herald who proclaimed orders and other matters of tribal interest.

The tribe was held together by two forces: the ceremonies pertaining to a common cult in which each village had its place and share, and the tribal council composed of the chiefs of the different villages. The confederacy was similarly united, its council being made up from the councils of the tribes. In the meetings of these councils rules of precedence and decorum were rigidly observed. No one could speak who was not entitled to a seat, although a few privileged men were permitted to be present as spectators. The council determined all questions touching the welfare of the tribe or of the confederacy.

War parties were always initiated by some individual and were composed of volunteers. Should the village be attacked, the men fought under their chief or under some other recognized leader. Buffalo hunts were tribal, and in conducting them officers were appointed to maintain order so as to permit each family to procure its share of the game. The meat was cut in thin sheets, jerked, and packed in parflèche cases for future use. Maize, pumpkins, and beans were cultivated. The maize, which was regarded as a sacred gift, was called "mother," and religious ceremonies were connected with its planting, hoeing, and harvesting. Basketry, pottery, and weaving were practised. The Pawnee house was the earth lodge (q. v.), the elaborate construction of which was accompanied with religious ceremony, and when after an absence from home the family returned to their dwelling the posts thereof were ceremonially anointed. Men shaved the head except for a narrow ridge from the forehead to the scalp-lock, which stood up like a horn. Frequently a scarf was tied around the head like a turban. Both beard and eyebrows were plucked; tattooing was seldom practised. The breechcloth and moccasins were the only essential parts of a man's clothing; leggings and robe were worn in cold weather and on gala occasions. Face painting was common, and heraldic designs were frequently painted on tent-covers and on the robes and shields of the men. Women wore the hair in two braids at the back, the parting as well as the face being painted red. Moccasins, leggings, and a robe were the ancient dress, later a skirt and tunic were worn. Descent was traced through the mother. There were no totems belonging to the confederacy. After marriage a man went to live with his wife's family. Polygamy was not uncommon.

The religious ceremonies were connected with the cosmic forces and the heavenly bodies. The dominating power was Tirawa, generally spoken of as "father." The heavenly bodies, the winds, thunder, lightning, and rain were his messengers. Among the Skidi the morning and evening stars represented the masculine and feminine elements, and were connected with the advent and the perpetuation on earth of all living forms. A series of ceremonies relative to the bringing of life and its increase began with the first thunder in the spring and culminated at the summer solstice in human sacrifice, but the series did not close until the maize, called "mother corn," was harvested. At every stage of the series certain shrines, or "bundles," became the center of a ceremony. Each shrine was in charge of an hereditary keeper, but its rituals and ceremonies were in the keeping of a priesthood open to all proper aspirants. Through the sacred and symbolic articles of the shrines and their rituals and ceremonies a medium of communication was believed to be opened between the people and the supernatural powers, by which food, long life, and prosperity were obtained. The mythology of the Pawnee is remarkably rich in symbolism and poetic fancy, and their religious system is elaborate and cogent. The secret societies, of which there were several in each tribe, were connected with the belief in supernatural animals. The functions of these societies were to call the game, to heal diseases, and to give occult powers. Their rites were elaborate and their ceremonies dramatic.

Four tribes of the Pawnee confederacy still survive: the Chaui or Grand Pawnee, the Kitkehahki or Republican Pawnee, the Pitahauerat or Tapage Pawnee, and the Skidi or Wolf Pawnee.

In 1702 the Pawnee were estimated by Iberville at 2,000 families. In 1838 they numbered about 10,000 souls, according to an estimate by houses by the missionaries Dunbar and Allis, and the estimate is substantially confirmed by other authorities of the same period, one putting the number as high as 12,500. The opening of a principal emigrant trail directly through the country in the '40's introduced disease and dissipation, and left the people less able to defend themselves against the continuous attacks of their enemies, the Sioux. In 1849 they were officially reported to have lost one-fourth their number by cholera, leaving only 4,500. In 1856 they had increased to 4,686, but 5 years later were reported at 3,416. They lost heavily by the removal to Indian Ter. in 1873-75, and in 1879 numbered only 1,440. They have continued to dwindle each year until there are now (1906) but 649 survivors.

Messrs Dunbar and Allis of the Presbyterian church established a mission among the Pawnee in 1834, which continued until 1847 when it was abolished owing to tribal wars. In 1883 the Woman's National Indian Association established a mission on the Pawnee reservation in Oklahoma, which in 1884 was transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church, under whose auspices it is still in operation.

Paxinos. A Minisink and subsequently a Shawnee chief of the 17th and 18th centuries. He appears first in history in 1680, when as sachem of the Minisink he sent 40 men to join the Mohawk in an expedition against the French, and 10 years later was sent by his tribe to confer with Gov. Dongan of New York in regard to engaging in the war against the same nation. About 1692 or 1694 a small body of Shawnee settled among the Munsee, of whom the Minisink formed a division, and possibly Paxinos may have been one of this party. He was married about 1717. As early at least as 1754 he is referred to as the "old chief" of the Shawnee (Loskiel, Miss. United Breth., pt. 2, 157-160, 1794), and is so designated in the New York Colonial Documents wherever referred to. Heckewelder (Ind. Nations, 88, 1876), confirmed by Brinton, also says he was the chief of the Shawnee. He removed from Minisink to the Delaware country, but at what date is unknown, his next appearance being in connection with the difficulties which grew out of the removal of the Delawares to Wyoming, Pa. After the death, in 1749, of Shekellimus, the father of Logan, who had been a friend of the Moravian missionaries, the latter were fortunate in gaining the friendship of Paxinos. In 1754 he, with Tedyuskung, warned the people of Gnadenhuetten to remove to Wajomick (Wyoming), Pa.; but for this their lives would have been in danger. The next year Paxinos renewed the warning and demanded an answer in the name of the Hurons. His wife, for whom he had great affection and to whom he had been married for 38 years, was converted and baptized with Paxinos' consent. Soon after his last visit the Moravian settlement at Shamokin was attacked, and hearing of the danger to which the missionary Kiefer was exposed, Paxinos sent his two sons to conduct him to a place of safety. He was present with chiefs of other tribes at Ft Johnson, N. Y., Apr. 15-19, 1757, in conference with Sir Wm. Johnson regarding lines of travel and trade (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 245-47, 1856), and also at the conference with Gov. Denny at Easton, Pa., in August of the same year (ibid., 316-20). Paxinos removed with his family to Ohio in 1755 or 1758, where his tribesmen joined in the war against the English. It is probable that he died shortly after this time. He left two sons, Kolapeka and Teata-percaum, the latter a chief of some note in the war of 1764 (Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 306, 1872). His name is given in various forms, as Paxihos, Paxi-nosa, Paxnos, Paxnous, Paxowan, Paxsinos, etc. (c. t.)

Axpiti.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Paxpili.—Ibid.

Payanmin. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Payaya. A prominent Coahuiltecan tribe living in the latter part of the 17th century on San Antonio r., Texas. In 1691 Father Massanet, when on his way to E. Texas, passed through their village, which was then apparently near the site of the present city of San Antonio. There he erected an altar, and, through a Pacpul interpreter, explained the Christian doctrine. For the native name of their stream, Yana guana, he substituted the Christian name San Antonio de Padua. As early as 1706 some of the Payaya were baptized at San Francisco Solano mission, on the Rio Grande, and this was one of the principal tribes for which Father Olivares founded San Antonio de Valero mission in 1718. They ranged at least from the Rio Grande to the Brazos. In 1716 Espinosa met them near the latter stream, and in 1717 Derbanne met them near the San Marcos (Colorado?). According to Rivera, writing in 1727, their most usual home was near the Medina, on an arroyo bearing the tribal name. At San Antonio de Valero mission the Payaya mingled particularly with the Xarame, who had been moved with the mission from the Rio Grande. These two tribes were the most constant inhabitants at the mission, and members of both were there as late as 1776 (Massanet, Diario, 1691, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 95; Teran, Descripción y Diaria Demarcación, 1691, MS., ibid., 28; Olivares, Carta, 1716, MS., ibid., 169; Derbanne, 1717, in Margry, Déc., vi, 206, 1886; Rivera, 1727, Diario, leg. 1957, 1736; Baptismal Records of San Antonio de Valero mission, MS., passim). Payne's Town. A refugee negro slave settlement formerly in Alachua co., Fla., named from King Payne, a Seminole chief.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 309, 1822.

Payojke (Pay-oi-ké, 'summer people'). One of the two branches into which each well regulated Tewa village is divided in consequence of certain traditional beliefs regarding the religious organization of that people (Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 304, 1890). See Tewa.

Payuguan. A tribe or subtribe, probably Coahuiltecan, at San Francisco Solano mission, near the Rio Grande, Mexico, after 1703. They were associated with the Piniquu, Pataguo, Xarame, Siaban, Terocodame (q. v.), and other tribes. After this mission became San Antonio de Valero, on San Antonio r., Texas, members of this tribe entered it, as records of their baptism there between 1720 and 1741 still exist. Their identity with the Payuhan tribe, mentioned in 1735, is evidenced by the fact that in the baptismal records both names are in one case applied to the same individual (Baptismal Rec. of San Francisco Solano and San Antonio de Valero missions, MS.). Rivera (Diario, leg. 2763, 1736) mentions them in 1727 as a Coahuila tribe, which would indicate that they did not extend E. of Medina r. Cf. Paquan. (H. E. Payupki. A ruined pueblo on a point of Middle mesa, 6 m. N. of Mishongnovi, N. E. Arizona. It was built and occupied by discontented Tanos, Tewa, and Tigua from the Rio Grande, who left their homes between the Pueblo rebellion of 1680 and 1696. In 1706 the Payupki villagers were attacked and defeated by Capt. Holguin, who in turn was driven by the Hopi from their territory. In 1742 padres Delgado and Pino visited the Hopi country and returned to the Rio Grande with 441 Indians, said to have been Tigua originally from Sandia and Alameda, and established them in the refounded pueblo of Sandia, to which village the Hopi still apply the name Payupki. Peace Policy. The Indian policy which is now accepted as the settled policy of the Government and is sustained by the common sentiment of the American people, was inaugurated by President Grant at the beginning of his first administration. On his recommendation Congress enacted the law, approved Apr. 10, 1869, providing for the appointment of a "Board of Commissioners," to consist of not more than 10 persons, to be selected by him (the President) "from men eminent for their intelligence and philanthropy, to serve without pecuniary compensation, who may under his direction exercise joint control with the Secretary of the Interior over the disbursement of the appropriations made by this Act, or any part thereof, as the President may designate." William Welsh of Philadelphia, John B. Farwell of Chicago, George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, Robert Campbell of St. Louis, F. S. Tobey of Boston, William E. Dodge of New York, Felix R. Brunot of Pittsburg, Nathan Bishop of New York, and Henry S. Lane of Indiana were the Board of Commissioners as at first appointed. They were at that time called "The Peace Commission." In his first annual message, Dec. 1869, President Grant said: "From the foundation of the Government to the present, the management of the original inhabitants of this continent, the Indians, has been a subject of embarrassment and expense, and has been attended with continuous robberies, murders, and wars. From my own experience upon the frontiers and in Indian countries, I do not hold either legislation, or the conduct of the whites who come most in contact with the Indians, blameless for these hostilities. The past, however, can not be undone, and the question must be met as we now find it. I have adopted a new policy toward these wards of the nation (they can not be regarded in any other light than as wards) with fair results, so far as tried, and which I hope will be attended ultimately with great success."

For nearly 40 years the Board of Indian Commissioners has cooperated with the Government, favoring such legislation and administration in Indian affairs as by peaceful methods should put an end to Indian discontent, make impossible Indian wars, and fit the great body of Indians to be received into the ranks of American citizens. For the measures which they have proposed, to effect these reforms, see United States Board of Indian Commissioners. The Mohonk Indian Conference (q. v.), inaugurated and maintained by one of the present members of the Peace Commission, by its marked influence in guiding public opinion has added a strong element of popular support to this Peace Policy. It is interesting to note that the inauguration of a distinctive Peace Policy toward the Indians is due to one of the greatest of American warriors, President Ulysses S. Grant. The wisdom of this plan is shown in the fact that the policy advocated by the Peace Commission has resulted in an entire cessation of Indian warfare for the last score of years. (M. E. G.)

Pea Creek Band. A band of Florida Seminole, part of whom shared in the massacre of Maj. Dade and his command on Withlacoochee r. in Dec. 1835.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, vi, 469, 1857.

Peag. By the Massachusetts Indians, strings of white and dark purple shell beads (put among animate objects) were termed respectively waⁿpaⁿpiag, 'white strings,' and sûkaⁿpiag, 'black strings' (=Abnaki waⁿbaⁿbiag and sêgaⁿbiag). The English settlers, unused to French nasal sounds, pronounced and wrote the first of these words wampampeag. The word is from wamp (waⁿp), 'white,' ampi (-aⁿpi), 'string,' and the animate plural -ag. Finding the word too cumbersome, the colonists divided it and formed the two terms "wampum" and "piag," neither of which has any meaning, since the first consists of the root wamp 'white,' with a suffixed nasalized vowel, am (=aⁿ), belonging to and forming an essential part of -ampe (aⁿpi) 'string,' while the generic suffix aⁿpi 'string' has no meaning without the prefix aⁿ. See Wampampeag, Wampum. (W. R. G.)

Peantias. Mentioned by Buchanan (Sketches of N. Am. Ind., i, 138, 1825) as a wandering tribe on both sides of the Mississippi, numbering 800 souls. Probably imaginary.

Pearls. On the arrival of Europeans in Florida, Louisiana, and Virginia, pearls were found to be in great favor for personal embellishment among the natives, and this gem at once became a factor of importance in the avaricious schemes of promoters of conquest and colonization. Fabulous stories were told of the abundance and beauty of the pearls, which were eagerly sought by barter and by plundering the graves of the natives where they had been buried with the dead. The Knight of Elvas relates that De Soto obtained from burial places at the town of Cofitachique on Savannah r., below the present Augusta, Ga., 350 pounds of pearls, and a member of the first Virginia colony "gathered together from among the savage people aboute five thousande: of which number he chose so many as made a fayre chaine, which for their likenesse and uniformitie in roundnesse, orientnesse, and pidenesse of many excellent colours, with equalitie in greatnesse, were verie fayre and rare" (Hariot, Narrative of Virginia, 18, 1893). But the supply was really limited, and the majority of those obtained were ruined as jewels by perforation for suspension or by the heat employed in opening the shellfish from which they were abstracted. It also appears that many of the larger specimens referred to by the early writers were probably really not pearls, but polished beads cut from the nacre of sea shells and quite worthless as gems. It has been found that the real pearls were obtained from bivalve shells—from the oyster along the seashore and in tidewater inlets, and from the mussel on the shores of lakes and rivers. The pearls were probably not especially sought and collected by the natives, but obtained in the course of food consumption, which resulted in the accumulation of the vast deposits of shells known as shell-heaps (q. v.). The very general use of pearls by the pre-Columbian natives is amply attested by archeologists who in recent years have explored the mounds of the interior valleys, Professor Putnam having obtained more than 60,000 pearls—nearly 2 pecks—drilled and undrilled, from a single burial mound near Madisonville, Ohio. It appears that pearls were rarely used by the tribes w. of the Mississippi and on the Pacific coast, although the most important American pearl fisheries of the present day are on the coast of the Gulf of California. The primitive tribes of that region were not sufficiently ambitious to seek and make use of these gems.

Pecan. The nut of Carya olivæformis, one of the largest and most majestic trees of the river bottoms of s. Indiana, s. Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, and Texas. The nut, the name of which has been spelled pecan from at least the time of Capt. Carver (1778), and is pronounced pékáwn in the W. and S., was early known also as "Illinois - nut." It is thin-shelled, smooth, and olive-shaped, much superior in flavor to the nuts of the rest of the genus, and has been held in great esteem for more than a century. The word pecan, as is shown by its pronunciation, was derived, not from the Creole pacane, but directly from Algonquian, in the various dialects of which pākd'n, pūk'd'n, pāgd'n, pūgd'n, pāká'n, is a general term for a hard-shelled 'nut'; hence the name "pecan-nut," sometimes used, is tautological. To the Illinois Indians the pecan was the nut par excellence, hence their designation of it simply as "nut," without any qualificative. The word is a radical one, and, as is the case with all Algonquian radical words, can be derived from no known root. The suggestion that it is from a root pāk, 'to strike,' is untenable, for the reason that if such were the case pākd'n would necessarily be derived from a verb pāke or pākeu, which could not possibly be formed from the root just mentioned. (W. R. G.)

Peccarecamek (? 'hickory town.'—Hewitt). A reported Indian settlement on the s. Virginia border, which, according to Indian information, had stone houses, of more than one story, which the inhabitants had been taught to build by the survivors of Raleigh's colony who escaped the massacre at Roanoke (Strachey, Va., 26, 1849).

Pechquinakonck (possibly from pechuwí 'near', nak 'island', unk the locative.—Gerard). An unidentified village in North Salem, Westchester co., N. Y., noted on Van der Donck's map of 1655. See Shonnard, Hist. Westchester Co., N. Y., 48, 1900. (W. M. B.)

Peckikery. See Hickory.

Pecking implements. One of the four principal shaping processes employed by the tribes in the manufacture of implements and other objects of stone is known as pecking, and the implements used are stone hammers (q. v.) of various shapes; some are mere fragments of hard, tough rock with suitable points or edges, while others are more or less completely specialized, the typical implement being somewhat discoidal in form, with periphery convex or angular in profile, and with the sides slightly pitted for the accommodation of the opposing thumb and fingers, which hold it lightly. The operation consisted of repeated blows rapidly delivered with the periphery or edge of the implement upon the surface to be shaped, and the crumbings which resulted, although minute, gradually reduced undesirable parts, formed grooves, ridges, pits, nodes, etc., giving such approximation to the form desired that the grinding and rubbing processes, which usually followed, readily produced the finished work. Consult the citations under Stonework. (W. H. H.)

Peckwes. A village in New Jersey, about 10 m. from Hackensack, in 1694. It probably belonged either to the Munsee or to the Shawnee, who were about that time removing from the S. to the Delaware country.—Schuyler (1694) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 98, 1854.

Pecos (from P'e'-a-ku', the Keresan name of the pueblo). Formerly the largest and most populous of the pueblos of New Mexico in historic times, occupied by a people speaking the same language of the Tanoan family, with dialectic variations, as that of Jemez; situated on an upper branch of Pecos r., about 30 m. s. e. of Santa Fé. In prehistoric times the Pecos people occupied numerous pueblos containing from 200 to 300 rooms each, and many compactly built single-story house groups of from 10 to 50 rooms each. These were scattered along the valley from the n. end of Cañon de Pecos grant to Anton Chico, a distance of 40 m. At the time of the arrival of the first Spaniards under Coronado, in 1540, the tribe had become concentrated in the great communal structure popularly known as Pecos. According to Bandelier, the Pecos declare that they came into their valley from the s. e., but that they originated in the n. and shifted across the Rio Grande, occupying successively the pueblos now in ruins at San José and Kingman previous to locating at their final settlement. The principal pueblo of the tribe, according to the same authority, was Tshiquité, or Tziquité (the pueblo of Pecos), which he identifies with the Acuique, Cicuic, Cicuye, etc., of the early Spanish chroniclers. Gatschet (Isleta MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1879), however, records Sikuyé as an Isleta name of Pecos pueblo, and as the Isleta people are Tigua and Coronado went from Tigux (Tigua) province directly to Pecos in 1540, it seems more likely that Cicuye in its various forms was the Tigua name of Pecos pueblo in the 16th century. Bandelier thinks it possible that the ruins at Las Ruedas and El Gusano are those of pueblos also occupied by the Pecos people contemporaneously with their principal town at the time of the Spanish advent, and, indeed, Zarate-Salmeron, about 1629, mentions that the tribe at that date occupied also the pueblo of Tuerto, near the present Golden. At the time of Coronado's visit Pecos contained 2,000 to 2,500 inhabitants. It consisted of two great communal dwellings, built on the terrace plan, each 4 stories high, and containing 585 and 517 rooms respectively in its ground plan. Two Franciscan friars remained there after Coronado's departure in 1542, but both were probably killed before the close of the year. Pecos was visited also by Espejo in 1583, Castañeda de Sosa in 1590-91, and Oñate in 1598, the last calling it Santiago. During the governorship of Oñate the first permanent missionaries were assigned to Pecos, and the great church, so long a landmark on the Santa Fé trail, was erected about 1617. The pueblo suffered severely first at the hands of the Que-recho, or Apache of the plains, and after 1700 through raids by the Comanche. In the revolts of 1680-96 against Spanish authority (see Pueblos) Pecos played an important part, and its actual decline may be said to have begun at this time. In 1760 Galisteo was a visita of its mission, and, including the latter pueblo, Pecos contained 599 inhabitants in that year. In 1782, however, the Pecos mission was abandoned, its people being ministered by a priest from Santa Fé. Its population had dwindled to 152 in 1790-93, probably on account of a Comanche raid in which nearly every man in the tribe was killed. Epidemics, brought about apparently by the proximity of the cemetery to the source of water supply, also hastened the diminution of the Pecos people. In 1805 they had become reduced to 104, and in 1838 the pueblo was finally abandoned, the 17 survivors moving to Jemez, where there are now perhaps 25 Indians of Pecos blood, only one of whom however was born at the mother pueblo. The names of Pecos ruins, so far as recorded, are Kuuanguala, Pomojoua, San José (modern Spanish name of locality), Seyupa, and Tonchuun. The Pecos clans were as follows: Waha (Cloud), Pe (Sun), Ya (Coyote), Seé (Eagle), Kyunu (Corn), Sohl (Badger), Sungti (Turquoise), Daahl (Earth or Sand), Wahaha (Calabash), Kiah (Crow), Pa (Deer), Shiankya (Mountain lion), Whala (Bear), Fwaha (Fire), Amu (Ant), Kot-saa (Pine), Petdelu (Wild Turkey), Tash-tye (Buffalo), Gyuungsh (Oak), Alawahku (Elk), Alu (Antelope), Morbah (Parrot), and Hayah (Snake).

Pectolite. A somewhat rare mineral, resembling nephrite, found in British Columbia and Alaska, and used by the native tribes for implements. It is hard and tough and made excellent hammers, which were sometimes ground into cylindrical shape and somewhat polished, showing to advantage the structure of this handsome stone, which is greenish gray and slightly translucent. Little is known of the distribution or manner of occurrence of pectolite. Analysis gives silica 54, lime 32, soda 9, water 4, magnesium, 1. For illustrations see Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 1892; Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 1899. (W. H. H.)

Pedee. A small tribe, probably Siouan, formerly living on the middle course of Pedee r., S. C. Nothing is known of its language and little of its history. On a war map of 1715 its village is placed on the E. bank, considerably below that of the Cheraw, about the present Cheraw. In 1744 they with others killed several Catawba, which led to their being driven from their lands into the white settlements. Two years later they and the Sara are named as tribes which had long been incorporated with the Catawba. In 1751 they were mentioned at the Albany conference as one of the small tribes living among the white people in South Carolina, against whom the Iroquois were asked not to war. While most of the Pedee joined the Catawba, there were some who remained among the white settlements as late as 1755. See Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 1894. (J. M.) Pedees.—Brion de la Tour, map, 1784. Pedees.—War map (ca. 1715) in Winsor, Hist. Am., V, 364, 1887. Pidees.—Glen (1751) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VI, 709, 1855.

Pedilonians. Mentioned by Buchanan (Sketches N. Am. Ind., I, 138, 1825) as a tribe, numbering 500 souls, living W. of the Mississippi. Probably imaginary.

Pedro's Village. Given by Bancroft (Nat. Races, I, 460, 1882, quoting Hayes' MS.) as a former Luiseño village 5 m. from Agua Caliente, S. Cal. It may equally well have belonged to the Agua Calientes or to the Diegueños.

Peekishe. A tribe which, according to a tradition of the Kansa, lived near them in Missouri, near the mouth of Kansas r. They had long hair which they wrapped around their heads like turbans, and they shaved the tops of their heads. The tribe is said to have gone S., none of them remaining near the Kansa.

Pe-e'-ki-ee.—Dorsey, Kansa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Peepchiltk (Pe-éptcilt'k, 'concave'). A Pima village N. E. of Casa Blanca, S. Arizona; so called from a family with "concave" noses.

Pe-éptcilt'k.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 18, 1902. Pepchalk.—Dudley in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1871, 58, 1872. Peptchörl.—ten Kate quoted by Gatschet, MS., B. A. E., XX, 199, 1888.

Peeyou. Given as one of the Calapooya tribes on Willamette r., Oreg. Not identified.

Peeyou.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 309, 1882. Peeyou.—Ross, Adventures, 236, 1847.

Pehir. A village mentioned by Joutel as being W. or N. W. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas, in 1687. The territory was controlled largely by tribes of the Caddoan family. (A. C. F.)

Pehir.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 137, 1846. Pehires.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723. Pehir.—Joutel, op. cit., 152.

Peiltzun ('buckskin'). An Apache clan or band at San Carlos agency and Ft. Apache, Ariz., in 1881.

Pe-iltzun.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Peinhoun. A village mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as being N. or N. W. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas. The name seems to have been given him by Ebahamo Indians, who were probably of Karankawan affinity. The locality was controlled principally by Caddoan tribes. See Orcan. (A. C. F.)

Peihumes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723. Peihoun.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 138, 1846. Peihoun.—Ibid., 152. Piohum.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 289, 1878. Piou.—Joutel in French, op. cit., 152.

Peisela (Pé'isela). A Bellacoola town at the entrance to the valley opening on the N. side of the mouth of Bellacoola r., Brit. Col. It was one of the Nuhalk villages (Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 48, 1898).

Peisiekan (Pe-i-si-e-kan, 'striped'). A band of Cree, occupying 40 or 50 tipis and roving and hunting near Tinder mts., Canada, in 1856.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Val., 237, 1862.

Peissaquo. A village or tribe spoken of by Joutel in 1687 as being N. or N. W. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas. The name seems to have been given him by Ebahamo Indians, who were probably of Karankawan affinity. The locality mentioned was controlled mainly by Caddoan tribes. (A. C. F.)

Peisacho.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 138, 1846. Peissaquo.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 288, 1878.

Peixol6e. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q.v.), in the vicinity of the lower Rio Grande, New Mexico, in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Peixtan. A former Shawnee or Nanticoke village on or near the lower Susquehanna, in Dauphin co., Pa., possibly on the site of the present Paxton or Paxtonville.—Evans (1707) quoted by Day, Pa., 391, 1843.

Pekaist (Pe'qaist, 'white stone'). A village of the Spences Bridge band of the Ntlakyapamuk, on the s. side of Thompson r., 32 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col.; pop. 5 in 1897 (the last time the name appears), including Pemainus.

Pakeist.—Can. Ind. Aff., 230, 1886. Pe'qaist.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 173, 1900. Phái'st.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Pukaist'.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. 1891, sec. II, 44, 1892.

Pekan. A name of the fisher (Mustela pennanti). The word is used by Charlevoix (Nouv. France, III, 134, 1744) and came into English through Canadian French, where it occurs also as pécan. It seems to be of Algonquian origin, though not western, for the animal is called in Chippewa otchig, in Cree otchek. It is referred by some to an Abnaki pékané, mentioned by Rasles, which Trumbull (Natick Dict., Bull. 25, B. A. E., 260, 1903) thinks means this animal. (A. F. C.)

Pekickery. See Hickory.

Pekoinoke. A village of the Nanticoke still existing in Maryland in 1755.—Mt Johnson conf. (1755) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VI, 983, 1855.

Pekwan. A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., at the mouth of Pekwan cr., N. W. Cal.

Pak-wans.—McKee (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 162, 1853. Pähk-wans.—Meyer, Nach dem Sacramento, 282, 1855. Pak-wan.—McKee op. cit., 194. Pee-quan.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Pekwiligii (possibly 'place of the Picuris people'). A former pueblo of the Jemez in New Mexico, the exact site of which is not known.

Pe-suil-a-gui.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 207, 1892. Pe'-kwil-i-gi-i'.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895.

Pekwuten. A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., on the tongue of land jutting out between it and the Trinity where they join, opposite Weitspus (Weitchpec), N. W. Cal. It is called also Pekwutl.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905.

Pelchia. Mentioned as a pueblo of New Mexico in 1598, possibly Keresan.

Pelchia.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 136, 1889 (misquoting Oñate). Pelchia.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Pelhell (Pe'leeli). Said by the Kwantlen to have been a division of their people who settled on the Pacific opposite Alert bay, Brit. Col. Probably, as Hill-

Tout suggests (Ethnol. Surv. Can., 55, 1902), they were identical with the Bel-lacoola.

Pelkatchek ('wherewith one catches fat'). A village of the Ntshaautin on Tchestata lake, Brit. Col.

Pel'catzék.—Morice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., 109, 1892. Pe-i'ka-toók.—Morice, Notes on W. Dénés, 25, 1893.

Pelones (Span.: 'the hairless ones'). Mentioned by Rivera (Diario, leg. 2602, 1736) as a tribe or village apparently near the lower Rio Grande in s. Texas. Probably Coahuiltecan. Mota Padilla (Conq. Nueva Galicia, 514, 1870) mentioned the Pelones in 1742 as a people connected with the missions of Nuevo León, Mexico.

Pemainus (Pemai'nus: according to Teit, 'the flat underneath or near the brow or steep,' because a low flat extends along the river here for some distance; according to Hill-Tout, 'grassy hills'). A village of the Spences Bridge band of Ntlakyapamuk, on the s. side of Thompson r., 28 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col. Pop. 5 in 1897, including Pekaist. Pemai'nus.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 173, 1900. Pimai'nūs.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Piminos.—Can. Ind. Aff., 196, 1885.

Pemaquid (? 'it is precipitous land.'—Hewitt). An Abnaki village in 1614 about the present Pemaquid, Lincoln co., Me. Fort Charles was built there in 1677, after the English occupancy became prominent in the colonial history of New England. It was taken and burned by the Abnaki on Aug. 2, 1689.

Panaquid.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 27, 1849. Pemaquid.—Strachey, ibid., 169 (the river). Pemmaguid.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., VI, 97, 1837. Pemmaguid.—Smith, map (ca. 1614) in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., V, 162, 1857. Penaquid.—Smith (1631) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., III, 20, 1833.

Pematuning ('at the Wry-mouth's.'—Hewitt). A village, probably of the Delawares, near Shenango, Pa., in 1764.—Hutchin's map (1764) in Smith, Bouquet's Exped., 1766.

Pemberton Meadows. The local name for a body of Lower Lillooet living N. of Lillooet lake, Brit. Col.; pop. 261 in 1906.

Pembina. A Canadian name for the acid fruit of Viburnum opulus, the high-bush cranberry, a plant growing in low ground, along streams, from New Brunswick, far westward, and s. to Pennsylvania. The word is a corruption of Cree nipimindn, 'watered-berry,' i. e. the fruit of a plant growing in, or laved by, water; not 'water-berry,' as has been stated, since that would be nipimin; and, besides, the fruit is not watery. The name of the fruit is derived from the habitat of the plant that bears it. (W. R. G.)

Pemmican. A food preparation (also spelled pemican) used in the wilds of the northern parts of North America, and made by cutting the meat of the reindeer into thin slices, drying the latter in the sun or over the smoke of a slow fire, pounding them fine between stones, and incorporating the material with one-third part of melted fat. To this mixture dried fruit, such as choke or June berries, is sometimes added. The whole is then compressed into skin bags, in which, if kept dry, it may be preserved for four or five years. Sweet pemmican is a superior kind of pemmican in which the fat used is obtained from marrow by boiling broken bones in water. Fish pemmican is a pemmican made by the Indians of the remote regions of the N. W. by pounding dried fish and mixing the product with sturgeon oil. The Eskimo of Alaska make a pemmican by mixing chewed deer meat with deer-suet and seal-oil. "This food," observes Lieut. Ray, "is not agreeable to the taste, probably owing to the fact that the masticators are inveterate tobacco-chewers." The word is from Cree pīmīkdn, 'manufactured grease,' from pīmīkeu, 'he (or she) makes (or manufactures) grease,' that is, by boiling crude fat, pīmū, in water and skimming off the supernatant oil. The verb is now used by the Cree in the sense of 'he makes pemmican.' The word is cognate with Abnaki pēmī-kdn. (W. R. G.)

Pemveans. Mentioned by Boudinot (Star in the West, 128, 1816) in a list of tribes; unidentified.

Penah ('turkey'). A former village of the Fox tribe, situated on the site of Cassville, Grant Co., Wis.—Snyder, Van-Vechten & Co., Hist. Atlas Wis., 209, 1878.

Peñasco Blanco (Span.: 'large white rock'). One of the most important ruins of the Chaco Canyon group, n. w. N. Mex., and one of the most remarkable of all known prehistoric Indian structures N. of Mexico. It is situated on a high mesa at the s. side of the canyon, about 3 m. below Pueblo Bonito. In plan it is an almost perfect ellipse; the long diameter is 500 ft, the short 365 ft. The w. half of the ellipse is occupied by the pueblo proper, which was 5 tiers of rooms deep and probably 4 stories high. The e. half consists of a continuous series of single-story rooms. The outer wall is in a ruinous condition, but little of it remaining. As in almost every one of the Chaco canyon buildings, there is no uniformity of structural skill displayed in the masonry, some portions being of the crudest kind while in other parts are beautiful examples of horizontal alternations of thick and thin blocks. There are 7 kivas on the w. side of the court, and a large one, 50 ft in diameter, outside the s. end. The rooms in the main building are larger, averaging 20 ft in length, varying in width from 10 to 20 ft, the width of the rooms in each tier being uniform throughout the entire length of the building.

Peñasca Blanca.—Simpson, Exped. Navajo Country, 82, 1850. Penasco Blanca.—Hardacre in Scribner's Mag., 275, Dec. 1878 (misprint). Señasca Blanca.—Domenech, Deserts N. Am., I, 200, 1860 (misprint).

Peñas Negras (Span.: 'black rocks'). A small communal pueblo on an eminence w. of the Pecos road, near the edge of a forest, 8 m. s. s. e. of Santa Fé, N. Mex. It was inhabited in prehistoric times by the Tanos or the Tewa, but its aboriginal name is unknown.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 97, 1892.

Penateka (Pēnātēka, 'honey eaters'). An important division of the Comanche, formerly ranging on the edge of the timber country in E. Texas, and hence frequently known to the whites as Eastern or Southern Comanche. They had but a loose alliance with their western kinsmen and sometimes joined the Texans or troops against them. They are now with the rest of the Comanche in s. w. Oklahoma.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1045, 1896. Hooish.—Smithson. Misc. Coll., II, art. 3, 53, 1862. Ho-is.—Neighbors in Ind. Aff. Pengnok. An Utkiavinmiut Eskimo village near C. Smythe, Alaska.—11th Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Penikikonau ('fish hawk'). A sub-phratry or gens of the Eagle phratry of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 42, 1896.

Peninsular Shellmound. One of the 5 principal shell deposits of Damariscotta r., Me., situated on a broad peninsula formed by a bend in the river about 1 m. N. of Newcastle. The mound extends along the w. bank for about 400 ft, and consists almost wholly of closely-packed oyster shells in an irregular mass varying from a few inches in thickness at the northern end to a height of about 22 ft near its southern extremity. The shells are exposed throughout its length on the river side, and a considerable portion of the mound has been undermined and washed away by the water. The mound is covered by a dense growth of pine and spruce. Large quantities of shell have been carried away for road making and other purposes, and many tons have been burned in the kiln which stands near its southern end. The mound has never been systematically explored, and but few artifacts have been found during the superficial examinations that have been made. Its structure and general contents are apparently the same as in the Whaleback mound (q. v.) on the opposite side of the river.

Penjeacá. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy, in the region of the lower Rio Grande, New Mexico, in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Penna (Pen'-nâ, 'turkey'). A gens of the Potawatomi.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 167, 1877.

Pennacook (cognate with Abnaki pënd-kuk, or penâ'kuk, 'at the bottom of the hill or highland.'—Gerard). A confederacy of Algonquian tribes that occupied the basin of Merrimac r. and the adjacent region in New Hampshire, N. E. Massachusetts, and the extreme s. part of Maine. They had an intermediate position between the southern New England tribes, with whom the English were most directly interested, and the Abnaki and others farther N., who were under French influence. Their alliances were generally with the northern tribes, and later with the French. It has been supposed that they were an offshoot of the southern tribes, as they spoke substantially the same language as the Massachusetts and Rhode Island Indians, and are generally classed with the Mahican. We know the confederacy only as constituted under the influence and control of Passaconaway, who probably brought into it elements from various tribes of the same general stock. The tribes directly composing the confederacy were: Agawam, Wamesit, Nashua, Souhegan, Amoskeag, Pennacook proper, and Winnepesaukee. The first three of these were in Massachusetts, the others in New Hampshire. The Accominta of Maine and the Naumkeag of Essex co., Mass., were merged in larger tribes and disappeared at an early period. Besides these, the following tribes were more or less connected with the confederacy and usually considered a part of it: Wachuset, Coosuc, Squamscot, Winnecowet, Piscataqua, and Newichawanoc. Some writers also include the Ossipee, Sokoki, Pequawket, and Arosaguntacook, but these four tribes had their closest relations with the Abnaki group. The Arosaguntacook were certainly connected with the Abnaki confederacy. Pentucket village also belonged to the Pennacook confederacy, although the Indians there do not seem to have been designated as a distinct tribe. The Pennacook were reduced by smallpox and other causes to about 2,500 in 1630, and in 1674 had decreased to about 1,250. On the outbreak of King Philip's war the next year the Nashua and Wachuset joined the hostile tribes, but the greater part of the Pennacook, under the chief Wannalancet, kept on friendly terms with the whites until the treacherous seizure of about 200 of their number by Waldron in 1676. They then abandoned their country, the greater part with their chief removing to Canada, while a considerable number fled westward. The latter were pursued by the English and overtaken at Housatonic r., and a number of them killed. The survivors escaped to the Mahican of the Hudson, and were afterward settled at Scaticook, Rensselaer co., N. Y. Those who had removed to Canada were first settled near Quebec, but being afterward joined by some of their relatives from Scaticook, they were given, in 1685, a tract at Côte de Lauzun, whence they removed in 1700 to St Francis, where they met the Abnaki, who were also exiles from New England. The St Francis Indians soon became noted as the bitterest foes of the English colonies, and so continued until the fall of the French power in America. Their descendants still reside at the same place. Soon after their settlement at St Francis they endeavored to persuade those at Seaticook to join them, but without success.

The following were Pennacook villages and bands: Accominta, Agawam, Amoskeag, Coosuc, Nashua, Newichawanoc, Ossipee, Pennacook, Pentucket, Piscataqua, Souhegan, Squamscot, Wachuset, Wamesit, Weshacum, Winnecowet, Winnepesauki. (J. M. C. T.)

Pennacook. A tribe of the Pennacook confederacy. They occupied both banks of Merrimac r. for some miles above and below Concord, N. H. They were the strongest and most influential tribe of the confederacy and the last to preserve their tribal name, having incorporated most of the other tribes before King Philip's war in 1675.

Pennacook. The principal village of the Pennacook tribe, situated on the site of the present Concord, N. H.

Penobscot (derived by Vetromile from Pānnawānbskek, 'it forks on the white rocks,' or Penaubsket, 'it flows on rocks'; Godfrey and Ballard practically agree with Vetromile, the name applying directly to the falls at Oldtown, but Ballard says it has also been rendered 'rock land,' from penops [penopsc] 'rock,' and cot [ot] locative, applied to the bluff at the mouth of the river near Castine. Gerard gives the aboriginal form as Pēnobskāt, lit. 'plenty stones'). A tribe of the Abnaki confederacy (q. v.), closely related in language and customs to the Norridgewock. They are sometimes included in the Malecite group, but this is an error. They were probably the most numerous tribe of the Abnaki confederacy, and for a time more influential than the Norridgewock.

They occupied the country on both sides of Penobscot bay and r., and claimed the entire basin of Penobscot r. Their summer resort was near the sea, but during the winter and spring they inhabited lands near the falls, where they still reside, their principal modern village being Oldtown, on Indian id., a few miles above Bangor, in Penobscot co. A band living on Moosehead lake, Me., was popularly known as Moosehead Lake Indians. That Indians of this tribe were encountered by navigators before the middle of the 16th century appears to be certain. Kohl (Discov. East Coast Am., 1869) says that Norumbega on the Penobscot was often visited by French navigators and fishermen from the Great Bank and that they built there before 1555 a fort or settlement. When more thorough exploration began in the 17th century the Penobscot chief, known as Bashaba (a term probably equivalent to head-chief), seems to have had primacy over all the New England tribes southward to the Merrimac. The residence of Bashaba at this period appears to have been somewhere in the region of Bangor, possibly at the Norumbega of early travelers. Champlain, who sailed up the Penobscot (called by him Norumbega) in 1605, says: "Now I will leave this discourse to return to the savages who had led me to the rapids of Norumbega, who went to inform Bessabes, their captain, and gave him warning of our arrival." His residence must therefore have been in the neighborhood of the rapids. The Penobscot at this period seem to have been distinct from the "Tarratine," or Abnaki of Norridgewock, and at war with them, although since the English occupancy of the country they have always been known as a part of the Abnaki and have sometimes been specifically designated as Tarratine. The principal village, from which the tribe derived its name, seems to have been identical with Pentagouet of early French and English writers, situated on or near the site of Castine, Me. The various forms of Pentagouet and Penobscot are constantly confused in literature. Other settlements at that period were at Mattawamkeag, Olamon, and Passadumkeag. All of these appear to have been temporary stations until the French gave a permanent character to Penobscot by the establishment of a mission there in 1688. The Penobscot took an active part in all the wars on the New England frontier up to 1749, when they made a treaty of peace, and have remained quiet ever since. This treaty brought them into disfavor with the Abnaki of St Francis, who continued hostilities in the French interest, for which reason very few of the Penobscot ever joined their emigrant tribesmen in Canada, and they now constitute the only important body of Indians remaining in New England excepting the Passamaquoddy. Different estimates gave them about 650 (1726), 1,000 (Chauvignerie, 1736), 700 (1753), 400 (1759), 700 (1765), and 350 (1786). Most of the estimates within the present century give them from 300 to 400 souls. They now number about 410. (J. M.)

Penoy. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned by Cavelier in 1687 (Shea, Early Voy., 39, 1861) as being next to Akasquy and a day's journey from the Sassory (Nasoni). This proximity to Cadogan people makes it probable that they were kindred. (A. C. F.)

Pensacola (Choctaw: 'hair-people,' from pansha 'hair', okla 'people'). A tribe once inhabiting tracts around the present city and harbor of Pensacola, w. Fla. According to Barcia (Ensayo, 316, 1723) they had been destroyed by tribal wars before the Spaniards became established there in 1696, but from a reference in Margry it appears that a few still remained at a later period. Peñunde. An unidentified tribe spoken of in 1683 by Juan Sabeata, a Jumano Indian from the mouth of Conchos r., N. E. Chihuahua, Mexico. It was one of 36 tribes, friendly to his own, and said by him to live on Nueces r., 3 days' journey E. of his home (Mendoza, Viage, 1683-84, MS. in Archivo General). It was Juan Sabeata's report that led to Domingo de Mendoza's expedition into Texas in 1683-84. (H. E. B.)

Peoria (through French Peouarea, from Peoria Piware^a, 'he comes carrying a pack on his back': a personal name.—Gerard). One of the principal tribes of the Illinois confederacy. Franquelin in his map of 1688 locates them and the Tapouaro (q. v.) on a river w. of the Mississippi above the mouth of Wisconsin r., probably the upper Iowa r. Early references to the Illinois which place them on the Mississippi, although some of the tribes were on Rock and Illinois rs., must relate to the Peoria and locate them near the mouth of the Wisconsin. When Marquette and Joliet descended the Mississippi in 1673, they found them and the Moingwena on the w. side of the Mississippi near the mouth of a river supposed to be the Des Moines, though it may have been one farther n. When Marquette returned from the S., he found that the Peoria had removed and were near the lower end of the expansion of Illinois r., near the present Peoria. At the close of the war carried on by the Sauk and Foxes and other northern tribes against the Illinois, about 1768, the Kickapoo took possession of this village and made it their principal settlement. About the same time a large part of the Peoria crossed over into Missouri, where they remained, building their village on Blackwater fork, until they removed to Kansas. One band, the Utagami, living near Illinois r., was practically exterminated, probably by the northern tribes, during the Revolutionary war (Gatschet, Sauk and Fox MS., B. A. E., 1882). Utagami, according to Dr Wm. Jones, may mean the Foxes who were known to the northern Algonquians as Utūgamig, 'people of the other shore.' The Foxes claim to have annihilated the Peoria for the help they gave the French and other tribes in the wars against them (the Foxes). The main body of the Peoria remained on the E. bank of Illinois r. until 1832, when, together with the other tribes of the old Illinois confederacy, they sold to the United States their claims in Illinois and Missouri, and to the consolidated tribes, under the names of Peoria and Kaskaskia, was assigned a reservation on Osage r., Kans. In 1854 the Wea and Piankashaw united with them, and in 1868 the entire body removed to Indian Ter. (Oklahoma), where they now reside. The Peoria made or joined in the treaties with the United States at Edwardsville, Ill., Sept. 25, 1818; Castor Hill, Mo., Oct. 27, 1832; Washington, D. C., May 30, 1854, and Feb. 23, 1867.

The early estimates of the numbers of the Peoria are altogether unreliable, and later estimates shed no light on their population from the fact that several Illinois tribes were then consolidated under the same name. In 1736 Chauvignerie estimated the Peoria at about 250 souls. They were so nearly exterminated soon afterward by the northern tribes that about the year 1800 Gov. William Henry Harrison of the Northwest Ter. could find only 4 men of the tribe living. In 1829 the Indians consolidated under that name numbered 120. According to the report of the Indian Office the Peoria and allied tribes in Oklahoma numbered 192 in 1906. (J. M. C. T.)

Pepewissains (Chippewa: pipikiwisse^{ns}, 'pigeon-hawk'.—Gerard). A gens or society of the Chippewa and also of the Ottawa.—Tanner, Narr., 314, 1830.

Pepikokia. An Algonquian tribe or band mentioned in the latter part of the 17th century as a division of the Miami. In 1718 both they and the Piankashaw were mentioned as villages of the Wea. That the relation between these three groups was intimate is evident. They were located on the Wabash by Chauvignerie (1736) and by other writers of the period. They are spoken of in 1695 as Miamis of Maramek r., that is, the Kalamazoo. A letter dated 1701 (Margry, Déc., iv, 592, 1880) indicates that they were at that time in Wisconsin. Chauvignerie says that Wea, Piankashaw, and Pepikokia "are the same nation, though in different villages," and that "the devices of these Indians are the Serpent, the Deer, and the Small Acorn." They were sometimes called Nation de la Gruë, as though the crane was their totem. They disappear from history before the middle of the 18th century and may have become incorporated in the Piankashaw, whose principal village was on the Wabash at the junction of the Vermilion.

Pequaock. See Pooquaw.

Pequawket (a name of disputed etymology, the most probable rendering, according to Gerard, being 'at the hole in the ground,' from pekuwakik). A tribe of the Abnaki confederacy, formerly living on the headwaters of Saco r. and about Lovell's pond, in Carroll co., N. H., and Oxford co., Me. Their principal village, called Pequawket, was about the present Fryeburg, Me. The tribe is famous for a battle fought in 1725 near the village, between about 50 English under Capt. Lovewell and 80 Indians, the entire force of the tribe, under their chief, Paugus. Both leaders were killed, together with 36 of the English and a large part of the Indian force. By this loss the Pequawket were so weakened that, together with the Arosaguntacook, they soon after withdrew to the sources of Connecticut r. After being here for a short while, the Arosaguntacook removed to St Francis in Canada, while the Pequawket remained on the Connecticut, where they were still living under their chief at the time of the Revolution. Some of them seem to have found their way back to their old home some time after the Lovewell fight.

Pequea (Piqua, 'dust,' 'ashes'). A Shawnee village on Susquehanna r., at the mouth of Pequea cr., in Lancaster co., Pa. It was settled by the tribe on its removal from the S. about the year 1694, and abandoned about 1730 for another location.

Pequot (contr. of Puquatauog, 'destroyers.'—Trumbull). An Algonquian tribe of Connecticut. Before their conquest by the English in 1637 they were the most dreaded of the southern New England tribes. They were originally but one people with the Mohegan, and it is possible that the term Pequot was unknown until applied by the eastern coast Indians to this body of Mohegan invaders, who came down from the interior shortly before the arrival of the English. The division into two distinct tribes seems to have been accomplished by the secession of Uncas, who, in consequence of a dispute with Sassacus, afterward known as the great chief of the Pequot, withdrew into the interior with a small body of followers. This body retained the name of Mohegan, and through the diplomatic management of Uncas acquired such prominence that on the close of the Pequot war their claim to the greater part of the territory formerly subject to Sassacus was recognized by the colonial government. The real territory of the Pequot was a narrow strip of coast in New London co., extending from Niantic r. to the Rhode Island boundary, comprising the present towns of New London, Groton, and Stonington. They also extended a few miles into Rhode Island to Wecapaug r. until driven out by the Narraganset about 1635. This country had been previously in possession of the Niantic, whom the Pequot invaded from the N. and forced from their central position, splitting them into two bodies, thenceforth known as Eastern and Western Niantic. The Eastern Niantic put themselves under the protection of the Narraganset, while the western branch became subject to the Pequot and were settled on their w. border. The conquerors rapidly extended their dominion over the neighboring tribes, so that just previous to the Pequot war Sassacus was the head over 26 subordinate chiefs and claimed control over all Connecticut e. of Connecticut r. and the coast westward to the vicinity of Guilford or New Haven, while all of Long Island except the extreme w. part was also under his dominion. Nearly all of this territory, excepting Long Island, was claimed by Uncas, the Mohegan chief, after the conquest of the Pequot. At the period of their greatest strength the Pequot probably numbered at least 3,000 souls, but have been estimated much higher.

By the murder of a trader who had treated them harshly, followed by several other acts of hostility, the Pequot became involved in a war with the colonists in 1637. Through the influence of Roger Williams and of Uncas the English secured the assistance, or at least the neutrality, of the neighboring tribes, and then marched against the Pequot. Their principal fort, near Mystic r., was surprised and set on fire, and probably 600 Pequot men, women, and children perished in the flames or were shot down while trying to escape. This terrible slaughter so crippled the Pequot that after a few desperate but unsuccessful efforts at resistance they determined to separate into small parties and abandon their country. Some went to Long Island, others fled to the interior, while a large party headed by Sassacus attempted to reach the Mohawk, but were intercepted near Fairfield, Conn., and almost the entire party were killed or captured. The prisoners became slaves to the colonists or were sold into the West Indies. The few who escaped to the Mohawk, including Sassacus, were put to death by that tribe. The scattered fugitives were shot down wherever found by the neighboring tribes, until the survivors at last came in and asked for mercy at the hands of the English. A party of 70 had previously made submission to the Narraganset and become a part of that tribe.

In 1638 the surrendered Pequot were distributed among the Mohegan, Narraganset, and Niantic, and forbidden longer to call themselves Pequot. Although it has been customary to regard the Pequot as exterminated in this war, such was far from being the case. They numbered 3,000 or more at the beginning of the war, and only about 700 or 800 are known to have been killed. The rest joined other tribes or finally submitted to the English. Several years afterward a Pequot chief was found living on Delaware r., and there can be no question that many others had found refuge with the Mahican and other western tribes. In June 1637, after the dispersion of the tribe, those about New Haven and on Long Island were reported to number 350 warriors, or about 1,250 souls. Those portioned out among the friendly tribes in September 1638, numbered 200 warriors, with their families, or about 700 in all. Of these, one-half went to the Mohegan, 80 warriors to the Narraganset, and 20 warriors to the Niantic. They occupied six separate villages among these tribes, in addition to those villages which were occupied jointly. At the same time there were a large number on Long Island who remained there in subjection to the English; others were in the vicinity of New Haven and among the Nipmuc and neighboring tribes; many were scattered as slaves among the English settlements, and others had been sent to the West Indies.

The Pequot who had been given to the Indian allies of the colonists were treated so harshly by their masters that it was finally necessary, in 1655, to gather them into two villages near Mystic r., in their old country, and place them under the direct control of the colonial government. Here they numbered about 1,500 in 1674. They decreased rapidly, as did the other tribes, and in 1762 the remnant numbered 140 souls, living in Maushantuxet, at Ledyard, Conn. In 1832 these were reduced to about 40 mixed-bloods, who still occupied their reserve and cherished the old hatred of the Mohegan, who lived a few miles distant. It appears from an article by Prince and Speck (Am. Anthropol., Apr. 1903) that there are still in Connecticut about 100 persons of Pequot-Mohegan blood. A colony of about 50 individuals of this group are employed chiefly as farm and factory workers a few miles s. of Norwich; the others live in adjacent towns. About 25, according to Speck (ibid., 1907), are still on the old Groton tract near Ledyard and keep themselves distinct from the Mohegan, but they retain practically nothing of their former culture. The following were Pequot villages: Aukumbusk, Cosattuck, Cuppunaugunnit, Mangunckakuck, Maushantuxet, Mystic, Nameaug, Paupattokshick, Pawcatuck, Sauquonckackock, Stonington, Tatuppequauog, and Weinshauks. from continued contact with the hand resting on the perforated stone in wielding a digging stick on which it served as a weight. The fact that this wear occurs always on the side of the smaller opening seems to indicate that the stones were slipped down on a shaft until arrested by an enlargement, enough of the shaft remaining above for a hand-hold. That most of these stones served in this manner as weights for digging sticks may be regarded as practically demonstrated. The smaller, toy-like specimens were probably employed by children or were made especially for burial with the dead. It is noted that the periphery of some of the discoidal forms shows traces of rough usage, such as would result from employment as hammers, but this may be the result of usage not originally intended.

Periodicals. The first periodical printed in any of the North American Indian languages was the Cherokee Phoenix, a weekly newspaper in English and Cherokee, edited by Elias Boudinot (q. v.), a native Indian, and published in Georgia at New Echota, the capital of the Cherokee Nation, from Feb. 21, 1828, to Oct. 1835. A religious magazine printed entirely in Cherokee, called the Cherokee Messenger, edited by Evan Jones and J. Bushyhead, was issued in twelve numbers from the Baptist Mission Press at Park Hill, Ind. T., between Aug. 1844, and May 1846; and a new series under the same title, edited by J. Buttrick Jones, appeared in 1858, but was soon discontinued. On Sept. 26, 1844, the first number of the Cherokee Advocate was published at Tahlequah, Ind. T. This was a weekly newspaper, published every Saturday morning, half in English and half in Cherokee.

The first series was discontinued in Sept. 1853. A new series was begun in 1870, and a third series in 1876. Of it, Mooney (19th Rep. B. A. E., 111, 1900) says: "It is still continued under the auspices of the Nation, printed in both languages and distributed free at the expense of the Nation to those unable to read English—an example without parallel in any other government." The Cherokee Almanac was an annual publication for many years.

The first number of a small semi-monthly or monthly newspaper in the Shawnee language, called Shau-wau-nowe Kesauthwau (Shawnee Sun), was published from the Shawnee Baptist Mission Press, Ind. T., on Mar. 1, 1835, and was continued under the editorship of Johnston Lykins until 1839, when it was discontinued. This was the first newspaper printed entirely in an Indian language. In the Seneca language the Rev. Asher Wright edited a small magazine called Ne Jaguhnigoagesquathah, or The Mental Elevator, of which were printed at the Buffalo Creek and Cattaraugus reservations in New York from Nov. 30, 1841, to Apr. 15, 1850, nineteen numbers in all.

The fourth Indian language to have a newspaper of its own was the Dakota. In Nov. 1850, the first number of Dakota Tawaxitku Kin, or the Dakota Friend, was published in Santee Dakota and English, edited by G. H. Pond, and printed at St Paul, Minn. The paper was issued monthly until Aug. 1852. Another newspaper, called Iapi Oaye (The Word-Carrier), in Santee and Yankton Dakota, was started in May 1871, and has been continued monthly under successive editors at Greenwood, S. Dak., and at the Santee agency, Nebr., the present (1907) editor being Rev. A. L. Riggs. In Jan. 1878, the Niobrara Mission issued the first number of a monthly paper called Anpao, The Day Break, which was printed mostly in Yankton Dakota, and was continued afterward at Madison, S. Dak., under the title Anpao Kin, The Daybreak. The Catholic mission at Fort Totten, N. Dak., also publishes a monthly paper in the Santee Dakota, entitled Sina Sapa Wockiye Taeyanpaha, the first number of which was issued in Feb. 1892, with the Rev. Jerome Hunt, of the Benedictine order, as editor. It is now (1907) in its eleventh volume.

The earliest periodical for the Chippewa Indians was entitled Petaubun, Peep of Day, published monthly at Sarnia, Ont., by the Rev. Thomas Hurlburt, beginning in Jan. 1861. It was in English and Chippewa, and was continued through 1862 or later. The Pipe of Peace, a Chippewa newspaper, edited by the Rev. E. F. Wilson in English and Chippewa, was published monthly at the Shingwauk Home in Sault de Ste Marie from Oct. 1878, till Sept. 1879. A fortnightly paper called The Indian was published at Hagersville, Ont., from Dec. 30, 1885, till Dec. 29, 1886, the editor being the chief Kahkewaquonaby (Dr Peter E. Jones). Although it was printed mainly in English, some Chippewa articles were included. There were, moreover, two periodicals in English edited by the Rev. E. F. Wilson, one entitled Our Forest Children, published monthly at the Shingwauk Home from Feb. 1887, to Sept. 1890, and the other entitled The Canadian Indian, published monthly at Owen Sound, Ont., from Oct. 1890, to Sept. 1891. Beginning with Mar. 1896, the publication of "a monthly journal [chiefly in Chippewa language] devoted to the interests of the Franciscan missions among the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians," under the title Anishinabe Enamiad, was commenced at Harbor Springs, Mich., by Father Zephyrin Engelhardt, and is still conducted by the Franciscan fathers at that place.

The periodicals of the Creek and Choctaw Indians begin with the one called Our Monthly, printed almost entirely in Muskogee, of which the first volume was issued in manuscript in 1870-72. From Jan. 1873, to Oct. 1875, the numbers were printed at Tullahassee, Creek Nation, the editors being the Rev. W. S. and Miss A. A. Robertson. A weekly newspaper, The Vindicator, "devoted to the interests of the Choctaws and Chickasaws," printed mostly in English, with occasional articles in Choctaw, was started at Atoka, Ind. T., in 1872. This paper was united with the Oklahoma Star about 1877 and was continued as the Star Vindicator at McAlester, Ind. T. In May 1876, another weekly newspaper, entitled Indian Journal, was started at Muskogee, Ind. T., and published in English and Muskogee. This paper was at one time the official organ of the Creek Nation. Our Brother in Red, first a monthly and afterward a weekly paper, printed in English, Muskogee, and Choctaw, was published at Muskogee, Ind. T., from 1882 to 1889 or later. A newspaper called The Indian Champion, "Official Paper of the Choctaw Nation," written in English and Choctaw, was published weekly at Atoka, Ind. T., beginning in 1884, but was discontinued at the close of 1885. The Indian Missionary, a monthly paper in English, Choctaw, and Muskogee, was begun at Eufaula, Ind. T., in Aug. 1884, and continued at Atoka. Another weekly paper, called The Muskogee Phoenix, also printed in English, Choctaw, and Muskogee, began to appear Feb. 16, 1888, at Muskogee, Ind. T. The Indian Chieftain, "devoted to the interests of the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminole, Creeks, and all other Indians of the Indian Territory," was published weekly at Vinita, Ind. T., from 1882 to 1888. The Indian Herald was published weekly at Pawhuska, Osage Nation, Ind. T., from 1875 to 1877 or later. The Indian Moccasin, published monthly at Afton, Ind. T., by Jeremiah Hubbard, a native Indian, was begun in Jan. 1893, and continued through 1894.

Four periodicals printed by the Indian missions near the Pacific coast are worthy of mention. One of these, The Youth's Companion, of which the Rev. J. B. Boulet was editor, a juvenile monthly magazine, published for the benefit of the Puget Sound Catholic mission, was set in type, printed, and in part was written by the pupils of the industrial boarding schools on the Tulalip res. in Snohomish co., Wash., from May 1881, to May 1886. Another, the Kamloops Wawa, is a little magazine in the Chinook jargon, written in stenographic characters reproduced by a mimeograph, published irregularly by Father J. M. R. Le Jeune at Kamloops, British Columbia, from May 1891, to Dec. 1904. Another is The Paper that Narrates, a monthly printed for two years at Stuart's Lake, Brit. Col., in the Déné syllabic characters invented by Father A. G. Morice, the first number of which appeared in Oct. 1891. The fourth is Hagaga, printed in Nass and English at Aiyansh Mission, Nass r., Brit. Col., from June 1893 until at least as late as Feb. 1895.

Several Indian periodicals have been published at the Indian Industrial School at Carlisle, Pa., among them being Eagle Keahlah Toh, monthly, Jan. 1880, to Mar. 1882; School News, monthly, June 1880, to May 1883, edited first by Samuel Townsend, a Pawnee boy, and later by Charles Kihega, an Iowa Indian boy; The Morning Star, monthly, Apr. 1882, to Dec. 1887; The Red Man, monthly, Jan. 1888, to June 1900; The Indian Helper, weekly, Aug. 14, 1885, to July 6, 1900; the last two were consolidated under the name The Red Man and Helper, published weekly from July 13, 1900, to July 29, 1904; The Arrow, weekly, Sept. 1, 1904, and still issued.

Of a kindred nature are The Moqui Mission Messenger, established by Rev. C. P. Coe, missionary among the Hopi of Arizona, and published first at the Hopi mission in typewriting on a manifolding machine in Jan. 1894, then printed at Chicago until Apr. 1895; The Indian School Journal, printed by the boys of the Chilocco Indian Industrial School at Chilocco, Okla.; The Albuquerque Indian, published monthly by the Albuquerque (N. Mex.) Indian School, June 1905, to May 1906; The Mission Indian, published monthly, later semimonthly, at the Banning (Cal.) mission, from 1885 to 1900; the Indian Advocate, published monthly by the Benedictine Fathers of Sacred Heart Mission, Okla., beginning in Jan. 1889; The New Indian, monthly organ of the Indian Training School at Stewart, Nev., beginning in 1903; The Indian Advance, published monthly by the Carson Indian School, Carson, Nev., from Sept. 1899; and two magazines recently established, one The Native American, published by the Indian School at Phoenix, Ariz., the other The Indian Outlook, published monthly by Rev. J. B. Rounds at Darlington, Okla.

The only periodical in the Greenland Eskimo, entitled Atuagagdliutit, an 8-page quarto paper, with woodcuts, has been published irregularly at Nungme (Godthaab), since Jan. 1861. (W. E.)

Persimmon (an apocopated form of Renápe pasimēnan, 'dried fruit,' i. e. fruit dried artificially; from pasimēneu, 'he (or she) dries fruit.' Fruit dried spontaneously would be pasimēn, 'dry fruit.' The word is cognate with Nipissing pasimīnan, a name in that dialect for a raisin or a dried huckleberry; Cree pasimīnan, a name for any fruit dried artificially. According to J. P. Dunn (inf'n, 1907), among the Miami and western Algonquian tribes generally it is pláhkemīn). The fruit of Diospyros virginiana, of the Ebenaceæ or Ebony family, known also as date-plum, or possum-wood. The tree is found over a large part of the United States from Connecticut to Florida and from Ohio to Texas. A species (Diospyros texana) is known as Mexican persimmon, black persimmon, chapote, etc. The Creole name, plaquemin, is a corruption of Illinois piakimin (cf. Miami piahkimin). The early writers on the Virginian country spelled the word in divers ways, as putchamin (Capt. John Smith, 1632), pessemin (Strachey, 1610-1613), persimena (1648), parsimon, posimon, putchimon, pit-chumon, persimon (Clayton, Flora Virg., 43, 156, 1743). This fruit, which resembles a yellow plum, but is globular and about an inch in diameter, is exceedingly austere and astringent before maturity, and, as Capt. John Smith (who was the first to notice it, under the name of putchamin) observes, draws "a man's mouth awry with much torment"; but, in the fall, after bletting, and being softened by the frost, it becomes sweet and fine-flavored. In the S. the fruit remains adherent to the branches long after the leaves have been shed (a fact to which the name mentioned by Smith alludes), and, when it falls to the ground, is eagerly devoured by wild and domestic animals. It was much esteemed by the Virginia Indians, who preserved it by drying it upon mats spread upon frames or barbecues. It is from the berries in the form of prunes that the name, after undergoing many vicissitudes of spelling, has been handed down to us, that probably being the condition in which the fruit was locally first seen, by the English settlers, in use among the Indians. The name of the fruit in a fresh or growing state (putchamin or pit-chumin) became obsolete at the beginning of the third quarter of the 18th century. The fruit is used in the S. for making a beverage called "persimmon (or simmon) beer," which is much liked by country folk. "Persimmon wine" is a spirituous liquor obtained by distilling persimmon beer.

"Huckleberry above the persimmon" is a Southern phrase meaning to excel (Bartlett). "To rake up the persimmons" is a Southern gambling term for pocketing the stakes, or gathering in the "chips." "The longest pole knocks down the most simmons" is a Southern adage meaning that the strongest party gains the day. "That's persimmons" is a Southernism for "that's fine." The hard flat seeds of the persimmon were used by the Algonquian Indians of Virginia in playing their mamantuwákan, or dice game. (A. F. C. W. R. G.)

Pescado. An unidentified tribe, spoken of in 1683 by Juan Sabeata, a Jumano Indian from the mouth of Conchos r., N. E. Chihuahua, Mexico. It was one of 36 tribes, friendly to his own, said by Sabeata to live on Nueces r., 3 days' journey from his home (Mendoza, Viage, 1683-84, MS. in Archivo General). (H. E. B.)

Peshewah (Pi-zhe'-wa, The Lynx). A Miami chief, better known on the frontier as John B. Richardville; born on St Marys r., Ind., near the present Ft Wayne, about 1761. After the death of Little Turtle the chiefship fell to Peshewah. Inheriting noble French blood on his father's side, his abilities were such, it is said, as well adapted him to direct the affairs of the Miami. He spoke French and English fluently, as well as his native tongue; and for many years his house on the bank of St Marys r., about 4 m. from Ft Wayne, was known as the abode of hospitality. At the time of his death, Aug. 13, 1841, Peshewah was about 80 years of age and was regarded as the wealthiest Indian in North America, his property, it is said, being valued at more than a million dollars. The town of Russiaville, Ind., takes its name, in corrupted form, from him. (C. T. J. P. D.)

Pessacus. A noted chief of the Narraganset (1623-77), brother of Miantonomo. In 1645-58 war was threatened between his people and the English, but was avoided after much talk and conference, chiefly by the diplomacy of Ninigret. Pessacus met his death in an expedition against the Mohawk. The unlatinized form of his name appears as Pessacks. (A. F. C.)

Pessemmin. See Persimmon.

Pestles. Implements used by the aborigines in combination with mortars and grinding plates for pulverizing foods, paints, and other substances. The use of pestles was general, and they are still constantly employed by tribes retaining their primitive customs. They are made of stone, wood, and more rarely of other materials. Boulders and other natural stones of suitable shape are very generally employed in the grinding work, and the less perfectly adapted forms are modified to accommodate them to the hand and to the particular grinding surface. Pestles for use on flat surfaces are cylindrical and used with a rolling motion, or are flattish beneath for use after the manner of a muller (q. v.). For use in a depression or a deep receptacle the grinding end of the implement is round or conical, while the upper part or handle is shaped for convenience in grasping or is carved to represent some esoteric concept associated in the primitive mind with the function of the apparatus. In many cases the shape of the implement was such that it could be used in one position as a muller and in another as a pestle (indeed, the Seneca apply the same name to both pestle and mortar, but modified by the terms "upper" and "lower"), while some examples have a concave surface, available as a mortar. The same stone becomes also on occasion a nut cracker and a hammer. Long, slender, cylindrical pestles are common in the Eastern states, a length of 2 ft being common, while the diameter rarely exceeds 3 in. In the Ohio and adjacent valleys a short, somewhat conical or bell-shaped form prevails, while on the Pacific slope the shapes are remarkably varied. The prevalent type of California pestle is somewhat cylindrical, but tapers gracefully upward, the length varying from a few inches to nearly 3 ft. They are sometimes encircled by a ridge near the base to keep the hand from slipping down, and frequently terminate above in a similar encircling ridge or a conical knob. On the N. W. coast the shapes are still more noteworthy, occasional examples being carved to represent animal forms. Some are T-shaped, suggesting the conventional pillow of the Egyptians, while still others have perforate or annular handles. Stone pestles are found on inhabited sites, but were rarely buried with the dead. They are less common in portions of the S. where stone was not plentiful, and in the Pueblo country, where the metate and muller were in general use.

Wooden pestles were used with wooden mortars, and were often maul-shaped, although both ends were sometimes enlarged, the implement being so long as to be held midway in its length, the operator standing upright. Very commonly the smaller end was used in the mortar, and the receptacle was deep and sharply conical to suit. Schoolcraft illustrates an ingenious use of pestles by the Indians of New Hampshire, the implement being suspended from the elastic branch of a tree, by which means the arduous task of lifting the heavy weight was avoided.

Petaikuk (Petá'íkük, 'where the petai [ash tree?] stands'). A former Pima village in s. Arizona.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 16, 1902. Cf. Pitac.

Petalesharo (Pitarésharu, 'chief of men'). A Skidi Pawnee chief, son of Old Knife (Letalesha), born about 1797. Long describes him as a man of fine physique and prepossessing countenance, and as the most intrepid warrior of his tribe. It was he who, at one time, when his tribesmen were assembled for the purpose of sacrificing a captive Comanche woman, stepped forward and declared that it was his father's wish to abolish this practice, and that he presented himself for the purpose of laying down his own life on the spot or of releasing the victim. He then cut the thongs that bound the woman to a cross, bore her swiftly through the crowd to a horse, which he presented to her, and, having mounted another himself, conveyed her beyond the reach of immediate pursuit; after having supplied her with food, and admonishing her to make the best of her way to her own tribe, which was at the distance of at least 400 m., he returned to his village. "This daring deed," says Long, "would, almost to a certainty, have terminated in an unsuccessful attempt under the arm of any other warrior, and Petalesharo was, no doubt, indebted for this successful and noble achievement to the distinguished renown which his feats of chivalry had already gained for him and which commanded the high respect of all his rival warriors." He signed, in behalf of his tribe, the treaty of Grand Pawnee village on Platte r., Nebr., Oct. 9, 1833, as Pe-tah-lay-shah-rho. The treaty of Table cr., Nebr., Sept. 24, 1857, was signed by "Petalesharo, the man and the chief." (C. T.)

Petao. A village or tribe mentioned by Joutel as living in 1687 N. or N.W. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas. The region was the abode of Caddoan tribes, and also of a few intrusive Tonkawan and Karankawan Indians. The name seems to have been mentioned to Joutel by the Ebahamo Indians, who were probably affiliated with the Karankawa. (A. C. F.)

Peticado (probably Fr. Petit Caddo, 'little, or lower, Caddo'). The name given by Mezières in 1770 to one of the Caddoan tribes between the Adai and the Kadohadacho, in Texas. Having left the Adai, Mezières passed through the Yatasi village, thence to the Peticado, thence to the Kadohadacho. The context of the reports makes it appear that the Peticado, also called "the Cado," were nearer to the Yatasi than to the Kadohadacho, and that their village was on or near Red r. At this time the Peticado village was dominated by French traders, particularly one Du Pain, who opposed the Spanish intrusion (Mezières, Relazion, Oct. 21, 1770, MS. in Archivo General, Provincias Internas, 100; Fray Santa María to the Viceroy, July 21, 1774, MS. in Archivo General). Pewikwithlchu (Pe'-wi-kwühl-tchu, 'grass swallowers,' in allusion to their drinking dew and rain water). An aboriginal people, mentioned in Zúñi tradition as having lived at a settlement about 13 m. s. of the present Zúñi pueblo. See Shuminkyaiman. (F. H. C.)

Peyotan ('peyote place'). A Cora pueblo and seat of a mission near the E. bank of Rio San Pedro, about lat. 22° 40', Jalisco, Mexico. Santa Rosa was its visita.

S. Juan Peyotan.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 280, 1864.

Peyote (Spanish derivative from the Nahuatl peyotl, 'caterpillar,' referring to the downy center of the "button"). A species of small cactus, variously classified as Anhalonium or Lophophora (Coulter), found in the arid hills along the lower Rio Grande and southward in Mexico; formerly and still much used for ceremonial and medicinal purposes by all the tribes between the Rocky mts. and the Gulf of Mexico, from Arkansas r. southward, almost to the City of Mexico. Among the various tribes it is known under different names, as señi (Kiowa); wokowi (Comanche); hikori or hikuli (Tarahumare). By the whites it is commonly but incorrectly known as "mescal," from a confusion with the maguey cactus of the S. W. from which the fiery intoxicant mescal is prepared. In appearance the peyote plant resembles a radish in size and shape, the top only appearing above ground. From the center springs a beautiful white blossom, which is later displaced by a tuft of white down. N. of the Rio Grande this top alone is used, being sliced and dried to form the so-called "button." In Mexico the whole plant is cut into slices, dried, and used in decoction, while the ceremony also is essentially different from that of the northern tribes.

Some chemical study of the plant was made by the German chemist Lewin as early as 1888, but the first knowledge of its ritual use was given to the world in 1891 by James Mooney, of the Bureau of American Ethnology, who had witnessed the ceremony while engaged in ethnologic investigations among the Kiowa, and brought back to Washington a large quantity for medical and psychologic experimentation. Tests thus far made indicate that it possesses varied and valuable medicinal properties, tending to confirm the idea of the Indians, who regard it almost as a panacea.

Among the Tarahumare and others of Mexico the chief feature of the ceremony, as described by Lumholtz, is a dance. Among the Kiowa, Comanche, and other Plains tribes it is rather a ceremony of prayer and quiet contemplation. It is usually performed as an invocation for the recovery of some sick person. It is held in a tipi specially erected for the purpose, and begins usually at night, continuing until the sun is well up in the morning. As many men as can sit comfortably within the tipi circle may participate, but, as a rule, women do not take part in the ceremony proper, but occupy themselves with the preparation of the sacred food and of the feast in which all join at the close of the performance. A fire is kept burning in the center of the tipi, inclosed within a crescent-shaped mound, on the top of which is placed a sacred peyote. Following an opening prayer by the chief priest, four peyotes are distributed to each participant, who chews and swallows them, after which the sacred songs begin to the accompaniment of the drum and rattle, each man singing four songs in turn, and are kept up all night, varied by the intervals of prayer and other distributions of peyote, with a peculiar baptismal ceremony at midnight. The number of "buttons" eaten by one individual during the night varies from 10 to 40, and even more, the drug producing a sort of spiritual exaltation differing entirely from that produced by any other known drug, and apparently without any reaction. The effect is heightened by the weird lullaby of the songs, the constant sound of the drum and rattle, and the fitful glare of the fire. At some point during the ceremony the sick person is usually brought in to be prayed for, and is allowed to eat one or more specially consecrated peyotes. At daylight the Morning Star song is sung, when the women pass in the sacred food, of which each worshiper partakes, and the ceremony concludes with the Meat song. The rest of the morning is given to friendly gossip, followed by a dinner under leafy arbors, after which the various families disperse to their homes.

Physiology. While practically nothing is known of the physiology of the Eskimo, with the exception of their great capacity for animal food, recent investigations have yielded definite information in this line regarding the Indians. It has been supposed that in his physiologic functions the Indian differs considerably from the white man, but the greater our knowledge in this direction the fewer the differences appear; there is, however, a certain lack of uniformity in this respect between the two races.

The period of gestation of Indian women is apparently the same as that of the whites, and the new-born child is in every way comparable to the white infant. It begins to suckle as soon as it is given the breast, generally shows excellent nutrition, and has from the beginning a good voice. In 6 to 8 months the first teeth appear; during the 7th or 8th month the child begins to sit up; at 1 year it stands alone, and soon after begins to walk; at the age of about 18 months it commences to talk, and when 4 years of age it has a good command of language. During its first year the Indian child spends as much time in sleeping as does a healthy white child, and after the first year is very playful. It cries, on the average, less than the white child, but the principal reason for this seems to be the fact that it is generally well nourished and not sickly. The infant is nursed usually much later than among whites, not infrequently up to its 3d or 4th year, but after its 6th to 9th month it also partakes of most of the foods of its parents. Up to the 7th year incontinence of urine is quite frequent, apparently without pathological cause, but this disappears spontaneously thereafter.

As among whites, the period of puberty in the Indian is earlier in the low and hot regions than in those that are elevated or cold. In such very hot regions as the lower Colorado valley many of the girls begin to menstruate between the ages of 11 and 13; while among tribes that live at a considerable altitude, as the Apache of Arizona and the Indians farther N., this function begins usually during the 13th or 14th year, and delays are more numerous; precise data from many localities are as yet lacking. The development of the breast in the girl commences usually at about the 12th year, and except among individuals there appears to be no great variation among the tribes of which there is most knowledge. Full development of the breast is seldom attained in the unmarried young woman before the 18th year. The time of puberty in Indian boys differs apparently but little, if any, from that in whites. Scanty growth of mustache is noticeable from about the 16th year, sometimes much later.

Marriage is generally entered into earlier than among American whites; only few girls of more than 18 years, and few young men of more than 22 years, are unmarried. Now and then a girl is married at 14 or 15, and there is an instance of a Comanche girl of 11 years who married a Kiowa. Among the latter tribe it is not exceptional for girls to be married at 13. Indian women bear children early, and the infants of even the youngest mothers seem in no way defective. The birth rate is generally high, from 6 to 9 births in a family being usual. Twins are not very uncommon, but triplets occur very rarely. One or more naturally sterile women may be met in every large band.

The adult life of the Indian offers nothing radically different from that of ordinary whites. The supposed early aging of Indian women is by no means general and is not characteristic of the race; when it occurs, it is due to the conditions surrounding the life of the individual. Gray hairs in small numbers may occasionally be found, as in brunette whites, even in children, but such occurrence is without significance. Senile grayness does not commence earlier than among healthy whites, and it advances more slowly, seldom, if ever, reaching the degree of complete whiteness. Baldness not due to disease is extremely rare. A common phenomenon observed in the aged Indian is pronounced wrinkling of the skin of the face and other parts. Little is known as to the exact period of menopause in the women, for but few of them know their actual age. Men remain potent, at least occasionally, much beyond 50 years. The longevity of the Indian is very much like that of a healthy white man. There are individuals who reach the age of 100 years and more, but they are exceptional. Among aged Indians there is usually little decrepitude. Aged women predominate somewhat in numbers over aged men. Advanced senility is marked by general emaciation, marked wrinkling of the skin, forward inclination of the body, and gradual diminution of muscular power as well as of acuteness of the senses. The teeth are often much worn down, or are lost mainly through the absorption of the alveolar processes.

Among the more primitive tribes, who often pass through periods of want, capacity for food is larger than in the average whites. Real excesses in eating are witnessed among such tribes, but principally at feasts. On the reservations, and under ordinary circumstances, the consumption of food by the Indian is usually moderate. All Indians readily develop a strong inclination for and are easily affected by alcoholic drinks. The average Indian ordinarily passes somewhat more time in sleep than the civilized white man; on the other hand, he manifests considerable capability for enduring its loss. Yawning, snoring, eructation, and flatus are about as common with Indians as with whites. Sneezing, however, is rare, and hiccough even more so. Dreams are frequent and variable. Illusions or hallucinations in healthy individuals and under ordinary conditions have not been observed. Lefthandedness occurs in every tribe, and with nearly the same frequency as among whites (approximately 3 per cent). The sight, hearing, smell, and taste of the Indian, so far as can be judged from unaided but extended observation, are in no way peculiar. In the ordinary Indian with healthy eyes and ears, the sight and hearing are generally very good, but in no way phenomenal. To those who receive education above that of the common school, glasses are often necessary. In the old, eyesight is generally weakened, and in some the hearing is more or less blunted. The physical endurance of Indians on general occasions probably exceeds that of the whites. The Indian easily sustains long walking or running, hunger and thirst, severe sweating, etc.; but he often tires readily when subjected to steady work. His mental endurance, however, except when he may be engaged in ceremonies or games, or on other occasions which produce special mental excitement, is but moderate; an hour of questioning almost invariably produces mental fatigue. Respiration and temperature are nearly the same as in healthy whites, the latter perhaps averaging slightly lower; but the pulse is somewhat slower, the general average in adult men approximating 66. Muscular force in the hands, tested by the dynamometer, is somewhat lower than with whites in the males and about equal in the females. The shoulder strength shows less difference, and the strength, or at least the endurance, of the back and lower limbs, judging from the work and other pursuits to which the Indians are accustomed, probably exceeds that of the whites.

The mental functions of the Indian should be compared with those of whites reared and living under approximately similar circumstances. On closer observation the differences in the fundamental psychical manifestations between the two races are found to be small. No instincts not possessed by whites have developed in the Indian. His proficiency in tracking and concealment, his sense of direction, etc., are accounted for by his special training and practice, and are not found in the Indian youth who has not had such experience. The Indian lacks much of the ambition known to the white man, yet he shows more or less of the quality where his life affords a chance for it, as in war, in his games, art, adornment, and many other activities.

The emotional life of the Indian is more moderate and ordinarily more free from extremes of nearly every nature, than that of the white person. The prevalent subjective state is that of content in well-being, with inclination to humor. Pleasurable emotions predominate, but seldom rise beyond the moderate; those of a painful nature are occasionally very pronounced. Maternal love is strong, especially during the earlier years of the child. Sexual love is rather simply organic, not of so intellectual an order as among whites; but this seems to be largely the result of views and customs governing sex relations and marriage. The social instinct and that of self-preservation are much like those of white people. Emotions of anger and hatred are infrequent and of normal character. Fear is rather easily aroused at all ages, in groups of children occasionally reaching a panic; but this is likewise due in large measure to peculiar beliefs and untrammelled imagination.

Modesty, morality, and the sense of right and justice are as natural to the Indian as to the white man, but, as in other respects, are modified in the former by prevalent views and conditions of life. Transgressions of every character are less frequent in the Indian. Memory (of sense impressions as well as of mental acts proper) is generally fair. Where the faculty has been much exercised in one direction, as in religion, it acquires remarkable capacity in that particular. The young exhibit good memory for languages. The faculty of will is strongly developed. Intellectual activities proper are comparable with those of ordinary healthy whites, though on the whole, and excepting the sports, the mental processes are probably habitually slightly slower. Among many tribes lack of thrift, improvidence, absence of demonstrative manifestations, and the previously mentioned lack of ambition are observable; but these peculiarities must be charged largely, if not entirely, to differences in mental training and habits. The reasoning of the Indian and his ideation, though modified by his views, have often been shown to be excellent. His power of imitation, and even of invention, are good, as is his aptitude in several higher arts and in oratory. An Indian child reared under the care of whites, educated in the schools of civilization, and without having acquired the notions of its people, is habitually much like a white child trained in a similar degree under similar conditions.

Piankashaw (possibly connected with Päyangitchaki, 'those who separate,' from pevangiani, 'I separate from,' according to Gatschet; the Miami form, according to J. P. Dunn, is Payünggish'ah). Formerly a subtribe of the Miami, but later a separate people. In an account of the rivers and peoples of the W., La Salle, about 1682, mentions the Piankashaw as one of the tribes gathered about his Illinois fort; these were bands brought from their usual habitat. In the account by Cadillac (1695) they are spoken of as being w. of the Miami village on St Joseph r., Mich., with the Mascoutens, Kickapoo, and other tribes. It is probable they were then on Vermillion r., in Indiana and Illinois. St Cosme (1699) says that the village of the Peanzichias Miamis was on Kankakee r., Ill., but that they formerly lived on the Mississippi. They had possibly been driven w. by the Iroquois. Their ancient village was on the Wabash at the junction of the Vermillion; at a later period they established another settlement, Chippekawkey, lower down the river, at the present site of Vincennes, Ind. About 1770 they gave permission to the Delawares to occupy the e. part of their territory. Chauvignerie (1736) says that the Wea, the Piankashaw, and the Pepicokia were the same nation in different villages, and gives the deer as the Piankashaw totem. In the beginning of the present century they and the Wea began to cross over into Missouri, and in 1832 the two tribes sold all their claims in the E. and agreed to remove to Kansas as one tribe. About 1854 the consolidated tribe united with the remnant of the Illinois, then known as Peoria and Kaskaskia, and in 1867 the entire body sold their lands in Kansas and removed to the present Oklahoma, where they are now known under the name of Peoria. The Piankashaw made or participated in treaties with the United States at Greenville, O., Aug. 3, 1795; Ft Wayne, Ind., June 7, 1803; Vincennes, Ind., Aug. 7, 1803, Aug. 27, 1804, and Dec. 30, 1805; Portage des Sioux, Mo., July 18, 1815; Vincennes, Ind., Jan. 3, 1818 (not ratified); Castor Hill, Mo., Oct. 29, 1832; Washington, D. C., May 30, 1854, and Feb. 23, 1867.

The Piankashaw probably never numbered many more than 1,000 souls. In 1736 Chauvignerie estimated the Piankashaw, Wea, and Pepicokia together at about 1,750. In 1759 the Piankashaw alone were estimated at 1,500, and five years later at 1,250. This was reduced to 950 in 1780, and 800 in 1795. In 1825 there were only 234 remaining, and in 1906 all the tribes consolidated under the name of Peoria numbered but 192, none of whom was of pure blood. (J. M.)

Piasa (probably cognate with Cree piyeshw, referring to an imaginary bird, a name of the thunderbird, and also cognate with the Chippewabine*ssi*, 'a large bird.'—Hewitt). The name given to a prehistoric pictograph formerly on the face of the rocky bluff where Alton, Ill., is now situated. It was first mentioned and described by Marquette, in the account of his journey down the Mississippi in 1673, who, however, speaks of two (Jes. Rel. 1673-75, Thwaites ed., LIX, 139, 1900; Shea, Discov. Miss., 39, 1852): "While skirting some rocks, which by their height and length inspired awe, we saw upon one of them two painted monsters which at first made us afraid, and upon which the boldest savages dare not long rest their eyes. They are as large as a calf; they have horns on their heads like those of deer, a horrible look, red eyes, a beard like a tiger's, a face somewhat like a man's, a body covered with scales, and so long a tail that it winds all around the body, passing above the head and going back between the legs, ending in a fish's tail. Green, red, and black are the three colors composing the picture." Marquette further says that the painting was well done. Douay, who visited the locality on his journey from Texas in 1686, considers this description as exaggerated, saying: "This frightful monster is a horse painted on a rock with matachia [an old term for paint] and some other wild beasts made by the Indians" (Shea, Discov. Miss., 223, 1852). He says he reached them without difficulty, and adds: "The truth is that Miamis pursued by Mitchigamias having been drowned here the Indians since then offertobacco to these figures." St Cosme, who journeyed down the Mississippi in 1699, says that the figures were then almost erased (Shea, Early Voy., 66, 1861). In 1836 John Russell published what he claimed to be the Indian "tradition of the Piasa," which is copied by McAdams in his Records of Ancient Races, 1887. The tradition is admitted to be chiefly imaginary, and is substantially the same as that given by Jones (Illinois and the West, 54-56, 1838). McAdams, who had studied the literature and local traditions relating to these figures, states that a figure made in 1825 by a Mr Dennis represented the animal as winged, and adopts this form in his book. The figure as seen by Marquette appears to have been almost precisely of the form and detail of the "medicine animal of the Winnebago" given by Schoolcraft (Ind. Tribes, II, pl. 55, fig. 224, 1852), and hence is probably connected with some myth. The latter author says the figure was drawn for him by Little Hill, a Winnebago chief, who stated that the animal was seen only by medicine-men. Parkman (Discov. Great West, 59, 1874) says that when he passed the place in 1867 "a part of the rock had been quarried away, and instead of Marquette's monster, it bore a huge advertisement." Picks. Digging implements of the pick type were in very general use among the aborigines, and native examples are still found among tribes most remote from the influence of the whites. Usually these implements are made of wood, bone, or shell, points of antler and walrus tusks being especially adapted for the purpose. They may well be regarded as in a measure filling the functions of the pick, the hoe, the spade, and, for that matter, the plow of civilized peoples. Stone picks were in somewhat common use in many sections, and numerous examples are preserved in our museums. It appears, however, that their employment was confined largely to mining and quarrying operations where the substances dealt with were too compact to be successfully managed with tools of less durable kind. These stone picks are often rude in shape and are not always readily distinguished from ruder forms of the ax, adz, chisel, and gouge, which served at times, no doubt, a somewhat similar range of functions. The simplest forms were unmodified fragments of stone of convenient shape, used in the hand or rudely hafted. The most primitive artificial forms were suitable pieces of stone slightly altered by chipping, pecking, and grinding, to make them more effective.

The most important class of stone picks are such as were used in getting out soapstone and rough-shaping the utensils made from it, and in working quarries of mica and iron oxides. These quarry implements are of different degrees of elaboration, ranging from the fragment or boulder brought to a point by a few blows of the hammer-stone to neatly shaped forms flaked or pecked and ground over the entire surface. Many are chisel-like and have flat edges, instead of points, and symmetric blades, though often rough at the upper end as if intended to be inserted in a socket. (See Stonework.)

These could with equal propriety be classed with chisels or even with adzes. In the soapstone quarries are found also many examples of celts, gouges, and grooved axes adapted by various kinds and degrees of remodeling to the work of extracting masses of the stone used in blocking out the vessels.

Pictographs. Pictography may be defined as that form of thought-writing which seeks to convey ideas by means of picture-signs or marks more or less suggestive or imitative of the object or idea in mind. Significance, therefore, is an essential element of pictographs, which are alike in that they all express thought, register a fact, or convey a message. Pictographs, on the one hand, are more or less closely connected with sign language (q. v.), by which they may have been preceded in point of time. Some, indeed, see in pictography a later stage of gesture speech, but the evidences assumed to be indicative of such genetic connection fall far short of proof, and it is believed that pictography may have had a more or less independent origin and career. Pictographs, on the other hand, are closely connected with every varying form of script and print, past and present, the latter being, in fact, derived directly or indirectly from them.

Although the earliest use of picture-signs is shrouded in the mists of antiquity, and although they have been employed by all uncivilized peoples, it is chiefly to the American Indian we must look for a comprehensive knowledge of their use and purpose, since among them alone were both pictographs and sign language found in full and significant employ.

Pictographs have been made upon a great variety of objects, a favorite being the human body. Among other natural substances, recourse by the pictographer has been had to stone, bone, skins, feathers and quills, gourds, shells, earth and sand, copper, and wood, while textile and fictile fabrics figure prominently in the list.

The tools by which and materials of which pictographs have been made are almost as various as the objects upon which they have been found. For carving upon hard substances, including cutting, pecking, scratching, and rubbing, a piece of hard pointed stone, frequently perhaps an arrowpoint, was an effective tool. For carving bone and ivory the Eskimo had learned to use the bow-drill. For incising bark and similar substances a pointed bone was employed. A piece of charcoal, or more often a bit of red ochre, served for drawing. Dyes of various shades of brown, red, and yellow, which were extracted from plants, were available for painting. The Zuni and Navaho employed corn-meal for ceremonial marking of their bodies, and for their famous dry-paintings (q. v.) used sand, ashes, and powdered mineral and vegetal substances of various hues.

For the Indian skilled in sign language it was natural and easy to fix signs upon bark, skin, or rock, but the evolution of pictographs into sound signs or a true phonetic alphabet must have been very slow, and its accomplishment was limited to a few peoples who already were pressing upon the confines of, if they had not entered, the civilized state. On this continent, so far as known, this stage of thought writing had been reached only by the Aztec and Maya, who in this, as in some other directions, had far outstripped other tribes. Had the coming of the Spaniard been delayed a few centuries it is probable that he would have found these peoples in possession of a written sound language.

In the earlier stages of picture-writing, when the savage artist sought to record facts and ideas, his picture signs assumed a literal form and, so far as his limited skill sufficed, natural and artificial objects were portrayed realistically. Neither in modeling nor sculpture, however, was the skill of the Indian artist sufficient for the accurate delineation of animate or inanimate objects, nor was such accuracy essential to his purpose; hence, when attempting the specific portrayal of animals, his end was attained chiefly by emphasizing prominent and unmistakable features, a method which soon led to the elimination of everything but essentials.

From the earliest form of picture-writing, the imitative, the Indian had progressed so far as to frame his conceptions ideographically, and even to express abstract ideas. Later, as skill was acquired, his figures became more and more conventionalized till in many cases all semblance of the original was lost, and the ideograph became a mere symbol. While the great body of Indian glyphs remained pure ideographs, symbols were by no means uncommonly employed, especially to express religious subjects, and a rich color symbolism likewise was developed, notably in the S. W.

Among the Indians of the United States the use of pictographic signs reached highest development among the Kiowa and the Dakota tribes in their so-called calendars. These calendars are painted on deer, antelope, and buffalo hides, and constituted a chronology of past years. The Dakota calendars have a picture for each year, or rather for each winter, while that of the Kiowa has a summer symbol and a winter symbol, with a picture or device representing some noteworthy event. The origin of the calendar, or "winter count," dates back probably only a few generations, and while the method of transcription is purely aboriginal it is to be inferred that contact with the whites had stimulated the inventive powers of the Indian in this direction without prescribing its form, just as Sequoya was stimulated to the invention of the Cherokee syllabary by the observed use of writing. (In addition to Mallery, consult Mooney in 17th and 19th Reports B. A. E., and see Sequoya.)

Tattooing (q. v.) is a form of picture-writing more widespread than any other and perhaps more commonly practised. Originating in very ancient times, it persists to-day among certain classes of civilized peoples. Besides the permanent incised, or painted; occasionally they are rendered both permanent and conspicuous by being first incised and then painted. They appear on sea-worn boulders, on glacier-polished rocks, on canyon cliffs, and within caves. Mallery states that petroglyphs of the incised form are more common in the N., while colored ones are more numerous in the S., and that petroglyphs of any kind are less common in the central part of the United States. The general absence in the interior of suitable media upon which to inscribe glyphs doubtless explains their general absence there, but the significance of the former facts of distribution is not apparent.

Our present knowledge of Indian petroglyphs does not justify the belief that they record events of great importance, and it would seem that the oft-expressed belief that a mine of information respecting the customs, origin, and migrations of ancient peoples is locked up in these generally indecipherable symbols must be abandoned. In the above connection it is of interest to note that similar and sometimes identical pictographic symbols ap-marking of the body by means of coloring matter introduced under the skin, tattooing includes scarification and body painting. Whether the practice of tattoo had its origin in a desire for personal adornment or, as concluded by Spencer and others, as a means of tribal marks, its final purposes and significance among our Indians were found by Mallery to be various and to include the following: Tribal, clan, and family marks; to distinguish between free and slave, high and low; as certificates of bravery in passing prescribed ordeals or in war; as religious symbols; as a therapeutic remedy or a prophylactic; as a certificate of marriage in the case of women, or of marriageable condition; as a personal mark, in distinction to a tribal mark; as a charm; to inspire fear in an enemy; to render the skin impervious to weapons; to bring good fortune, and as the design of a secret society.

The form of picture-writing known as the petroglyph is of world-wide distribution and is common over most of North America. Petroglyphs may be pecked or pear in widely remote parts of the world, and Mallery notes that the pictographs of Central and South America show remarkable resemblances to some from New Mexico, Arizona, and California. Bearing in mind the racial identity, similar culture status, and, in a general way, the similar environment of their makers, such resemblances, and even identities, in pictographic representation are in no wise surprising. Even were it possible to establish for these similar and widely separated symbols a common significance, which is not the case, such facts are best interpreted as coincident, and as closely analogous to the occurrence of identical words in unrelated languages. Upon this head Col. Mallery pertinently remarks that in attempts to prove relationship identity of symbols is of less importance than general similarity of design and workmanship. His further statement, conservative though it be, that by the latter criteria it is possible, to a limited extent, to infer migrations and priscan habitat is less convincing. It is thought that criteria like these should be employed with great caution, and that in such studies their chief value must ever be as aids in connection with other and corroborative evidence.

When interrogated, modern Indians often disclaim knowledge of or interest in the origin and significance of the petroglyphs, and often explain them as the work of supernatural beings, which explanation in the minds of many invests them with still deeper mystery. Beyond the fact that by habits of thought and training the Indian may be presumed to be in closer touch with the glyph maker than the more civilized investigator, the Indian is no better qualified to interpret petroglyphs than the latter, and in many respects, indeed, is far less qualified, even though the rock pictures may have been made by his forbears.

That, as a rule, petroglyphs are not mere idle scrawls made to gratify a fleeting whim, or pass an idle moment, is probably true, although sometimes they are made by children in play or as a pastime. Nevertheless their significance is more often local than general; they pertain to the individual rather than to the nation, and they record personal achievements and happenings more frequently than tribal histories; petroglyphs, too, are known often to be the records of the visits of individuals to certain places, signposts to indicate the presence of water or the direction of a trail, to give warning or to convey a message. However important such records may have seemed at the time, viewed historically they are of trivial import and, for the greater part, their interest perished with their originators. Many of them, however especially in s. w. United States, are known on the authority of their makers to possess a deeper significance, and to be connected with myths, rituals, and religious practices.

Whatever the subjects recorded by Indian glyphs, whether more or less important, the picture signs and their symbolism were rarely part of a general system, unless perhaps among the Aztec and the Maya, but are of individual origin, are obscured by conventionalism, and require for their interpretation a knowledge of their makers and of the customs and events of the times, which usually are wanting.

From the above appears the futility of serious attempts to interpret, without extraneous aid, the rock writings of ancient man, since in most cases it is almost certain that only the writer and his intimate compeers possessed the key.

While pictographs in general have not yielded the rich fund of information of past peoples and times expected by students, and while the historic import and value of many of them are slight or altogether wanting, their study is important. These pictures on skin, bark, and stone, crude in execution as they often are, yet represent the first artistic records of ancient, though probably not of primitive, man. In them lies the germ of achievement which time and effort have developed into the masterpieces of modern eras. Nor is the study of pictographs less important as affording a glimpse into the psychological workings of the mind of early man in his struggles upward.

Pictou. A Micmac village or band at the northern end of Nova Scotia in 1760.—Frye (1760) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 116, 1809.

Picuris (from Pikuria, its Keresan name). A Tigua pueblo about 40 m. n. of Santa Fé, N. Mex., identified by Bandelier with the Acha of the chroniclers of Coronado's expedition in 1540-42. It early became the seat of the Franciscan mission of San Lorenzo and was said to have contained 3,000 inhabitants in 1680, when, in the Pueblo revolt of that year, the natives killed their missionary, burned the church, and abandoned the pueblo, but it was rebuilt near its former site in or soon after 1692. In 1704 the Picuris people, on account of some superstition, again deserted their pueblo and fled to Quartejejo (q. v.), a Jicarilla settlement 350 leagues n. e. of Santa Fé, but were induced to return 2 years later. On this account and by reason of their proximity to the Jicarillas in later times, the Picuris tribe has a considerable infusion of Apache blood. Pop. 125 in 1900, 101 in 1904. Consult Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, v, 182-83, 1890. See Khahitan, Pueblos, Tigua. (F. W. H.)

Pierrish. A former Potawatomi village, commonly known as Pierrish's Village, on the N. bank of Eel r., just above Laketon, Wabash co., Ind. It took its name from a resident French half-breed interpreter, Pierrish Constant, known to the Miami as Pahtash, 'Miring Down' (J. P. Dunn, inf'n, 1907).

Pieskaret. The Algonkin name, often written Piskaret, of a noted Algonkin (Adirondack) chief, who lived on the N. bank of the St. Lawrence, below Montreal, Canada, in the first half of the 17th century. According to Schoolcraft (W. Scenes and Remin., 87, 1853) the dialectic form in his own tribe was Bisconace ('Little Blaze'). Although he became noted by reason of his daring, comparatively few incidents of his life have been recorded. Charlevoix (New France, ii, 181, 1866) says he was "one of the bravest men ever seen in Canada, and almost incredible stories are told of his prowess." His most noted exploit occurred during an excursion into the Iroquois country with but four followers, well armed with guns, when they encountered on Sorel r., in five boats, a band of 50 Iroquois, most of whom they killed or captured. On another occasion Pieskaret ventured alone within the Iroquois domain, and coming to one of their villages, by secreting himself during the day succeeded in killing and scalping the members of a household each night for three successive nights. He was ultimately brought under the influence of Catholic missionaries and in 1641 was baptized under the name Simon, after which he was commonly known among the whites as Simon Pieskaret. After his acceptance of Christianity so much confidence was placed in his prudence and ability that he was commissioned to maintain peace between the French and the Indians, as well as between the Hurons and Algonkin; he was authorized to punish delinquents, "and especially those who committed any fault against religion. It is wonderful how he discharged his office." (Jes. Rel. 1647, xxxi, 287, 1898.) He was present and made a speech at the conference between the French governor and the Iroquois and other tribes at Three Rivers, Canada, in 1645. Two years later, while a large body of Iroquois were going on a pretended visit to the governor, some of their scouts met Pieskaret near Nicolet r., and treacherously killed him while off his guard. Piguique. A tribe or subtribe, mentioned by Fray Bartholomé García (1760), under the name of Pihuiques, as one whose young people understood the language of his Manual, i. e. Coahuiltecan. They lived near the Texas coast, between Nueces and San Antonio rs., and were closely related to the Pamaques, of which tribe they seem sometimes to have been regarded as a subdivision. García's statement suggests a recent attachment of the Piguique to the Pamaque. In 1766 part of them were reported as living on the Isla de Culebras with the Copane and Karankawa tribes. This fact, taken with García's statement, might indicate that they were of Karankawan stock, but had recently mingled much with the Coahuiltecan and had learned their language. Previous to 1766 the Piguique had suffered greatly from measles and smallpox (Diligencias Practicadas por Diego Ortíz Parrilla, 1766, MS.). Their history, so far as it is known, is the same as that of the Pamaque (q. v.), unless the Piguicanes are the same. Some of the Piguicanes entered Espíritu Santo de Zúñiga mission, which does not seem to be true of the Pamaque (Solis, Diario, 1767-68, MS.). (H. R. B.)

Pile dwellings. Primitive dwellers along the shallow margins of the sea, on the banks of bayous, tide-water rivers, and lands in general subject to inundation found it necessary to raise the floors of their dwellings above the reach of tide and flood. This was done by erecting mounds of earth or shells, or by planting poles or piles in the yielding earth to which floor timbers could be attached at suitable levels. Pile dwellings were observed by early Spanish explorers of the Caribbean sea, and Venezuela ('Little Venice') received its name from the fact that the native dwellings, like those of Venice, were built in the midst of the waters. Dwellings of this type are still used by natives of the Venezuelan lagoons, and the Indians of Florida, occupying lands subject to overflow, build houses of nearly identical construction. As described by MacCauley, the typical Seminole house is approximately 9x18 ft in horizontal extent and is made partly or wholly of products of the palmetto tree. Eight palmetto piles support the roof, which is strongly framed of poles and thatched with leaves of the same tree, the eaves being about 7 ft and the ridge pole about 12 ft from the ground. The platform is 3 or 4 ft from the ground and is supported by split palmetto logs lying transversely, flat side up, upon beams which extend lengthwise of the building, and are lashed to the uprights with ropes of palmetto fiber. The thatching of the roof is quite a work of art inside, the regular laying of the leaves displaying much skill and taste on the part of the builder. The sides are open at all seasons of the year. In recent years traces of pile dwellings have been discovered by Cushing on Key Marco, on the gulf coast of Florida, and he was of the opinion that the key dwellers generally built their villages in this manner, digging artificial canals and water courts to accommodate their boats, and erecting mounds and platforms for the more ambitious religious and civic structures. A unique use of timbers in the construction of habitations is observed on the island of St Michael, Alaska, where the Eskimo fishermen have built pile dwellings against the rugged and precipitous cliffs far above the reach of the waves. Niblack refers to houses raised on high logs or stilts. He states that, "according to Vancouver, amongst the Kwakiutl of Johnstone strait, there were dwellings 'raised and supported near 30 ft. from the ground by perpendicular spars of very large size' with 'access formed by a long tree in an inclined position from the platform to the ground, with notches cut in it by way of steps about a foot and a half asunder.'" According to Boas the Bel-lacoola also erected pile dwellings. See Architecture, Cliff-dwellings, Habitations.

SEMINOLE HOUSE, FLORIDA. (MACCAULEY)

Pillagers (translation of their own name, Ma'kündwäwiniwäg, 'robber people,' so called because at one time they were the most formidable robbing unit of the Chippewa.—W. J.). A division of the Chippewa, formerly living in n. Minnesota on Leech and Ottertail lakes and in the intermediate country. They are now gathered on the reservation at Leech lake, formerly their principal rendezvous, and on White Earth res. They formed the advance guard of the Chippewa in the invasion of the Sioux country, establishing themselves first on Leech lake, and gradually pushing westward from that point. Morse (Rep. to Sec. War, 32, 1822) says these Indians were in bands, each having its own chief. The Pillagers made or joined in treaties with the United States at Leech lake, Minn., Aug. 21, 1847, and at Washington, D. C., Feb. 22, 1855, Mar. 11, 1863, and May 7, 1864. In 1855 they numbered about 1,200, under 7 chiefs. In 1884 they were reported at 1,556. The official census for 1906 makes the number 2,377: 837 Leech Lake and 464 Cass and Winibigoshish Pillagers at Leech lake, and 726 Ottertail, 289 Leech Lake Pillagers, and 61 Cass and Winibigoshish at White Earth.

Pima ('no,' in the Nevome dialect, a word incorrectly applied through misunderstanding by the early missionaries—B. Smith in Shea, Lib. Am. Ling., III, 7, 1861). As popularly known, the name of a division of the Piman family living in the valleys of the Gila and Salt in s. Arizona. Formerly the term was employed to include also the Nevome, or Pimas Bajos, the Pima as now recognized being known as Pimas Altos ('Upper Pima'), and by some also the Papago. These three divisions speak closely related dialects. The Pima call themselves A'-i'tam, 'the people.'

PIMA MAN

According to tradition the Pima tribe had its genesis in the Salt River valley, later extending its settlements into the valley of the Gila; but a deluge came, leaving a single survivor, a specially favored chief named Cího, or Sóho, the progenitor of the present tribe. One of his descendants, Sivano, who had 20 wives, erected as his own residence the now ruined adobe structure called Casa Grande (called Sivanoki, 'house of Sivano') and built numerous other massive pueblo groups in the valleys of the Gila and Salt. The Sobamuri, believed to have been a branch of the Papago, attributed these now ruined pueblos, including Casa Grande, to people who had come from the Hopi, or from the N., and recent investigations tend to show that the culture of the former inhabitants, as exemplified by their art remains, was similar in many respects to that of the ancient Pueblos. Sivano's tribe, says tradition, became so populous that emigration was necessary. Under one of the sons of that chief a large body of the Pima settled in Salt River valley, where they increased in population and followed the example of their ancestors of the Gila by constructing extensive irrigation canals and reservoirs and by building large defensive villages of adobe, the remains of which may still be seen.

The Pima attribute their decline to the rapacity of foreign tribes from the E., who came in three bands, destroying their pueblos, devastating their fields, and killing or enslaving many of their inhabitants. Prior to this, however, a part of the tribe seceded from the main body and moved s., settling in the valleys of Altar, Magdalena, and Sonora rs., as well as of adjacent streams, where they became known as Pimas Bajos or Nevome, and Opata. The others descended from the mountains whence they had fled, resettled the valley of the Salt, and again tilled the soil. They never rebuilt the substantial adobe dwellings, even though needed for defense against the always aggressive Apache; but, humbled by defeat, constructed dome-shaped lodges of pliable poles covered with thatch and mud, and in such habitations have since dwelt. The names applied to the Pima by the Apache and some other tribes furnish evidence that they formerly dwelt in adobe houses. Early in the 19th century the Pima were joined by the Maricopa, of Yuman stock, who left their former home at the mouth of the Gila and on the Colorado owing to constant oppression by the Yuma and Mohave. Although speaking distinct languages the Maricopa and Pima have since dwelt together in harmony. They intermarry, and their general habits and customs are identical.

How much of the present religious belief of the Pima is their own is not known, though it is not improbable that the teachings of Kino and other missionaries in the 17th and 18th centuries influenced more or less their primitive beliefs. They are said to believe in the existence of a supreme being, known as the "Prophet of the Earth," and also in a malevolent deity. They also believe that at death the soul is taken into another world by an owl, hence the hooting of that bird is regarded as ominous of an approaching death. Sickness, misfortune, and death are attributed to sorcery, and, as among other Indians, medicine-men are employed to overcome the evil influence of the sorcerers. Scarification and cauterization are also practised in certain cases of bodily ailment.

Marriage among the Pima is entered into without ceremony and is never considered binding. Husband and wife may separate at pleasure, and either is at liberty to marry again. Formerly, owing to contact with Spaniards and Americans, unchastity prevailed to an inordinate degree among both sexes. Polygamy was only a question of the husband's ability to support more than one wife. The women performed all the labor save the hunting, plowing, and sowing; the husband traveled mounted, while the wife laboriously followed afoot with her child or with a heavily laden burden basket, or kího, which frequently contained the wheat reaped by her own labor to be traded by the husband, often for articles for his personal use or adornment.

The Pima have always been peaceable, though when attacked, as in former times they frequently were by the Apache and others, they have shown themselves by no means deficient in courage. Even with a knowledge of firearms they have only in recent years discarded the bow and arrow, with which they were expert. Arrowpoints of glass, stone, or iron were sometimes employed in warfare. War clubs of mesquite wood also formed an important implement of war; and for defensive purposes an almost impenetrable shield of rawhide was used. The Pima took no scalps. They considered their enemies, particularly the Apache, possessed of evil spirits and did not touch them after death. Apache men were never taken captive; but women, girls, and young boys of that tribe were sometimes made prisoners, while on other occasions all the inhabitants of a besieged Apache camp were killed. Prisoners were rarely cruelly treated; on the contrary they shared the food and clothing of their captors, usually acquired the Pima language, and have been known to marry into the tribe.

Agriculture by the aid of irrigation has been practised by the Pima from prehistoric times. Each community owned an irrigation canal, often several miles in length, the waters of the rivers being diverted into them by means of rude dams; but in recent years they have suffered much from lack of water owing to the rapid settlement of the country by white people. Until the introduction of appliances of civilization they planted with a dibble, and later plowed their fields with crooked sticks drawn by oxen. Grain is threshed by the stamping of horses and is winnowed by the women, who skilfully toss it from flat baskets. Wheat is now their staple crop, and during favorable seasons large quantities are sold to the whites. They also cultivate corn, barley, beans, pumpkins, squashes, melons, onions, and a small supply of inferior short cotton. One of the principal food products of their country is the bean of the mesquite, large quantities of which are gathered annually by the women, pounded in mortars or ground on metates, and preserved for winter use. The fruit of the saguaro cactus (Cereus giganteus) is also gathered by the women and made into a sirup; from this an intoxicating beverage was formerly brewed. As among most Indians, tobacco was looked upon by the Pima rather as a sacred plant than one to be used for pleasure. Formerly they raised large herds of cattle in the grassy valleys of the upper Gila. The women are expert makers of watertight baskets of various shapes and sizes, decorated in geometric designs. They also manufacture coarse pottery, some of which, however, is well decorated. Since contact with the whites their native arts have deteriorated.

The Pima are governed by a head chief, and a chief for each village. These officers are assisted by village councils, which do not appoint representatives to the tribal councils, which are composed of the village chiefs. The office of head-chief is not hereditary, but is elected by the village chiefs. Descent is traced in the male line, and there are five groups that bear some resemblance to gentes, though they exert no influence on marriage laws, nor is marriage within the group, or gens, prohibited (Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 313-15, 1903). These five groups are Akol, Maam, Vaaf, Apap, and Apuki. The first three are known as Vultures or Red People, the other two as Coyotes or White People. They are also spoken of respectively as Suwuki Ohimal ('Red Ants') and Stoam Ohimal ('White Ants').

The Pima language is marked by the constant use of radical reduplication for forming the nominal and verbal plural. It is also distinguished by a curious laryngeal pronunciation of its gutturals, which strangers can imitate only with great difficulty.

The Pima within the United States are gathered with Papago and Maricopa on the Gila River and Salt River res. The Pima population was 3,936 in 1906; in 1775 Father Garcés estimated the Pima of the Gila at 2,500. Their subdivisions and settlements have been recorded as follows, those marked with an asterisk being the only ones that are not extinct. Some of the names are possibly duplicated.

Piman Family. One of the northern branches of the Nahuatl or Aztec family of Buschmann, and of the Sonoran branch of the Uto-Aztecan family of Brinton, but regarded by Powell as a distinct linguistic stock. The extensive ramifications which the former authorities assign to this group, in which they include also the Shoshonean tribes, are not yet accepted as fully proven. With the exception of most of the Pima, part of the Papago, and the now extinct Sobaipuri, all the tribes composing this family inhabit or inhabited N. w. Mexico, including the greater portions of the states of Sonora, Chihuahua, Sinaloa, and Durango, as well as parts of Jalisco and Zacatecas. Besides the tribes mentioned the family includes the Nevome, Opata (including Endeve and Jova), Tarahumare, Cahita, Cora, Huichol, Tepecano, Tepehuane, Nio, Tepahue, and Zoe, with their numerous branches. For further information see under the divisional names. Consult Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 98, 1891, and authorities thereunder cited; Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864; Brinton, *Am. Pimitoui. A village of the Illinois confederacy on Illinois r., near the mouth of Fox r., in LaSalle co., Ill. In 1722 the inhabitants abandoned it and removed to Cahokia and Kaskaskia. The band occupied different localities at different periods; in 1699 they were but 8 leagues from the Mississippi. They clung to their old belief after other bands of the Illinois had accepted missionary teachings. On some old maps the Pimitoui and Peoria villages near Peoria lake are given as identical. (J. M.)

Pimtainia (Pim-t'ainin, 'deer people'). A clan of the Tigua of Isleta, N. Mex.—Lummis quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 350, 1896.

Pinal Coyotero. A part of the Coyotero Apache, whose chief rendezvous was the Pinal mts and their vicinity, s. of Gila r. in Arizona. They ranged, however, about the sources of the Gila, over the Mogollon mesa, and from s. Arizona to the Gila and even southward. They are now under the San Carlos and Ft Apache agencies, where they are officially classed as Coyoteros. According to Bourke, there were surviving among them in 1882 the following clans (or bands): Chisnedinadinaye, Destchetinaye, Gadinchin, Kaihatin, Klokadakaydn, Nagokaydn, Nagosugn, Tegotsugn, Titeassinaye, Tutsoshin, Tutzose, Tziltadin, and Yagoyecayn.

They are reputed by tradition to have been the first of the Apache to have penetrated below the Little Colorado among the Pueblo peoples, with whom they intermarried (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folklore, iii, 112, 1890). They possessed the country from San Francisco mt. to the Gila until they were subdued by Gen. Crook in 1873. Since then they have peaceably tilled their land at San Carlos.

WIFE OF CHIKUITO

White (Hist. Apaches, MS., B. A. E., 1875), for several years a surgeon at Ft Apache, says that they have soft, musical voices, uttering each word in a sweet, pleasant tone. He noted also their light-hearted, childish ways and timid manner, their pleasant expression of countenance, and the beauty of their women. Married women tattooed their chins in three blue vertical lines running from the lower lip. Pinal Coyotero.—Steck in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 346, 1860. Piñal Coyotero.—Steck in Cal. Pinaleños (Span: 'pinery people'). A division of the Apache, evidently more closely related to the Chiricahua than to any other group. Their principal seat was formerly the Pinaleno mts., s. of Gila r., s. e. Arizona, but their raids extended far into Sonora and Chihuahua, Mexico. They were noted for their warlike character and continued their hostility toward the United States (notwithstanding 1,051, including Arivaipa, were on the San Carlos reserve in 1876), until forced by Gen. George Crook to surrender in 1883. They are now under the San Carlos and Ft Apache agencies, Ariz., being officially known as Pinals, but their numbers are not separately reported. The Pinalenos and the Pinal Coyoteros have often been confused. See Apache.

Pinawan ('windy place'). A ruined pueblo of the Zuni, about 1½ m. s. w. of Zufi pueblo, on the road to Ojo Caliente, N. Mex. The name has been associated with Aquinsa, mentioned by Oñate in 1598, on account of the possible misprinting of Apinawa, a form of the name Pinawan, but there is no other evidence, and the ruins have every appearance of being those of a prehistoric village. For plan and description see Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 86, 1891. (F. W. H.)

Pincers. Little or nothing exists to show that the Indians had pincers before the coming of white men, though the presence of this tool generally among less modified tribes argues its employment in precolumbian times, and specimens have not survived because the elastic properties of wood or horn were doubtless utilized in the manufacture of pincers and these substances easily decay. Tribes in the environment of the prickly-pear (Opuntia) handled its spiny fruit with pincers made of a single piece of elastic with the moistened and bent over into the proper form, or a straight stick with a wide slit extending almost its entire length, after the fashion of a clothespin. Tribes which used hot stones for cooking or for the sweat-bath usually handled them with pincers of bent wood or of two pieces of wood held together near one end with a ring of tough splint, or the pincers were merely two sticks held one in each hand.

Small pincers or tweezers were almost universally used, on account of the custom of removing coarse hair from the body, and it is probable that the primitive form was two valves of shell or simply two small pieces of wood, bone, or horn. Later they were commonly home-made of a bit of sheet-iron or brass, but the trader found the commercial article a desirable addition to his stock. The Ntlak-yapamuk of Thompson r., Brit. Col., have pincers made of two pieces of horn, in construction like the pincers for handling hot stones, or made of a single piece of wood or copper.

Consult Holmes in Nat. Mus. Rep. 1900, pl. 15, 33, 1901; Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., I, pt. iv, p. 227, May 1900. (W. H.)

Pinder Town. A settlement formerly on Flint r., Ga. Woodward, in 1817, stated that the Indians were "Chehaws," in which event the settlement was probably a part of Chiaha on Chattahoochee r. There was also a Chiaha on Flint r., perhaps identical with Pinder.

Turkey-Home.—Ibid. Turkey Town.—Pickett, Hist. Ala., ii, 298, 1851.

Pinini (from Pininéos, the New Mexican corruption of Spanish Pigméos, 'pig-mies'). A mythic tribe to which, according to San Felipe tradition, is attributed the slaughter of many of the inhabitants of the former Cochiti town of Kuapa in New Mexico, in consequence of which the pueblo was permanently abandoned. The Cochiti themselves assert that the destroyers of the ancient settlement mentioned were the Tewa.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 166, 1892. See Ishtuayene.

Pininicangui ('place of the corn-flour'). A prehistoric Tewa pueblo on a knoll in a valley about 2 m. s. of Puye and 3 m. s. of Santa Clara cr., on the Pajarito plateau, Sandoval co., N. Mex. It was built of volcanic tufa blocks, roughly dressed, its ground-plan forming a large rectangle about 150 by 210 ft. The pueblo probably antedated the great Puye settlement by many years. See Hewett in Bull. 32 B. A. E., 1907. (E. L. H.)

Piniquu. A tribe or subtribe, probably Coahuiltecan, represented at San Francisco Solano mission, near the Rio Grande, in Coahuila, Mexico, in 1704, with the Xarame, Payuguan, Siaban, Siaguan, Pataguio, and Apache. (H. E. B.)

Minicau.—Baptismal Rec. 1705, MS. Piniquu.—Ibid., 1704.

Pinnokas. Mentioned by Schoolcraft (Travels, viii, 1821) as one of the tribes seen by Lahontan on his imaginary journey up "Long r." in 1703. Misquoted, and the name intended not determinable.

Pins. Slender cylindrical pieces of pointed and headed bone, shell, wood, horn, and metal were made by the Indians for special purposes as well as for ordinary fastening. In many instances awl-like worked bones, found in ancient sites, were blanket fasteners such as are used by the N. W. coast tribes, and probably such pins were common among tribes that wore robes and blankets. Pins also were employed in joinery, in the fastening of bags and tent flaps, for stretching skins in drying, and as pickers for the pipe. Until recently they were stuck in holes made in the lobe and rim of the ear by a number of tribes E. of the Mississippi, and nose and ear pins were seen by explorers among California and Oregon tribes. Large and small pins of shell have been found in sites in the E. and on the Pacific coast (Holmes, Putnam). Thorns serve as pins among the Ntlakyapamuk of Thompson r., Brit. Col. (Teit). The most general use of the pins was as a support for the plumes worn in the hair. A pin was used by the Eskimo for closing wounds in game to prevent loss of blood, which is a delicacy among this people.

Pintados (so called by the Spaniards because of their custom of tattooing or painting their bodies). A tribe, some members of which visited Fray Marcos de Niza while at Matape, a town of the Eudeve in central Sonora, Mexico, and who claimed to live E. of that place. Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, v, 133, 1890) has been unable to determine whether the original narration refers to the custom of tattooing or painting; if the latter, he is inclined to the opinion that they were Pima or So-baipuri; otherwise they are not identifiable.

Pintahae. A Saponi town visited by Lederer in 1670; according to Lawson (Hist. Car., 1709), the residence of the "king."

Pintce ('confluence of Pin river'). A village of the Nikozliautin on Stuart lake, Brit. Col., at the mouth of Pintce r.; pop. 42 in 1906.

Pinchy.—Harmon, Jour., 205, 1820. Pintoe.—Morice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., x, 109, 1892.

Pinthlocco. A former Creek town on Pinthlocco cr., in Coosa co., Ala.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ala. map, 1899.

Pintiats (Pin'-ti-ats). A Paiute band formerly living in or near Moapa valley, S. E. Nev.; pop. 47 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Pintos (Span.: 'the piebald ones'). A tribe living in 1757 on the N. side of the Rio Grande, opposite Reynosa, in Texas. Across the river, in Tamaulipas, lived the Alapaguemes (Pedro de Estrada, in Cuervo, Revista, 1757, MS. in Archivo Gen., Hist., LVI). At the same time a part of the tribe was under a mission at the villa of San Fernando, near by. In 1780 Cabello said they were at the mission of Nuevo Santander (Rep. on Coast Tribes, MS. in Béxar Archives). The tribe was reported to have been always peaceful. (H. E. B.)

Pinutgu (Pi'nútgu', 'Penateka Comanche'). A contemptuous term applied by the Cheyenne to those of their own tribe who remained quiet during the outbreak of 1874-75. (J. M.)

Piogo. A prehistoric Tewa pueblo at the site of the village of Los Luceros (now called Lyden) on the E. bank of the Rio Grande, in the S. E. part of Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. The present inhabitants of San Juan claim it as one of their ancient settlements, whence their ancestors settled in the locality which they to-day occupy. Pipea. A tube in which tobacco was smoked is to-day called a pipe. Some pipes were straight, others curved; still others had a bowl at a right angle to the stem, and in certain instances the angle was acute; some pipes had two or more bowls or stems. In North America the shape of pipes varied according to locality; some were of a single piece, others had detachable stems. The pipe most widely distributed was a straight tube, usually plain on the outside, but occasionally elaborately ornamented. The rudest pipes of this type were made from the leg-bone of a deer or other animal, and were often reinforced with a piece of rawhide, which, wrapped on wet, contracted in drying and thus aided in preventing the bone from splitting. The tubular stone pipe had one end enlarged to hold the tobacco, the stem being inserted in the opposite end. Pipes of this form had necessarily to be smoked by throwing the bowl. The cloud-blower of the Pueblos is a straight tubular pipe, varying from a few inches to a foot in length.

Those of small size are usually made of clay in the same manner as pottery. Large cloud-blowers are usually made of stone, and do not differ in form, decoration, or use from those of clay. This form of pipe is used solely for ceremonial purposes, the smoke being blown to the cardinal directions by medicine-men.

Though there is evidence of reeds or other tubes having been used for inhaling smoke for medicinal purposes prior to the Christian era in Europe, there is little doubt that the tobacco pipe, now common over the world, is of American origin. Pipes were made of pottery, wood, bone, metal, or stone, or a combination of two or more of these mate-would hold but a thimbleful of tobacco, others would contain an ounce or more.

The most diminutive pipes now used are those of the Alaskan Eskimo. Those of the greatest capacity are the flat-bellied and monitor pipes, found along the Atlantic coast and inland to Ohio and Tennessee. Among many Indian tribes the pipe was Certain of their danc- pipes are also flat, i. e. the stem and the bowl are in the same plane.

The word "calumet" (q. v.) was early employed as the name of a dance. Marquette referred to the calumet in 1675, not only in the latter sense, but also as a pipe. Father Biard, in 1616, and Father Hennepin, in 1679, applied the term to the pipe, in which sense it is still employed. Various early writers refer to a calumet of peace and one of war, the former being white, the latter red. Lalitan

NEW YORK; STEATITE. (LENGTH, 4 IN.)

(Mœurs des Amérindiens, II, 327, 1724) refers to the calumet as a true altar where sacrifice was made to the sun; he also speaks of the calumet of peace. The bowl of the calumet pipe of the Sioux is at a right angle to the stem, and has a solid projection extending in front of the bowl.

In the older specimens of this type high polish and carved figures are unusual; with modern examples, however, high polish is common and the stems are often elaborately carved. In comparatively recent time inlaying became usual, geometrical or animal figures being cut in the stone into which thin strips of lead were inlaid.

Pipe stems are straight, curved, or twisted; round or flat; long or short. Elaborate ornaments for the stems have been said to be made by the women with beads, porcupine quills, feathers, hair, etc., but it is probable that they were put on by the men. The design of the pipe was characteristic of the tribe using it and was readily recognized by friends or enemies. (George Catlin, after whom pipe-stone was named (see Catlinite), truthfully says that the stems of pipes were carved in many ingenious forms, quite staggering the unenlightened to guess how they were bored until the process was explained. The simplest way was to split a suitable piece of wood lengthwise, remove the heart, and glue the two parts together again. One of the most elaborately modeled of all the varieties of American pottery pipes is that found in the region

ARKANSAS QUARTZITE. (LENGTH, 7 IN.)

formerly occupied by the Iroquois. The pottery was usually burned hard and the bowls elaborately ornamented with figures of birds and animals. In one specimen both bowl and stem are covered with a number of human faces; another is in form of the head and neck of a bird, probably a pigeon, the beak projecting above the bowl on the side farthest from the smoker, the bowl being formed of the bird's head and the stem representing the neck. Another graceful specimen is in the form of a snake. Stone pipes also were found in this region, including those of marble of a rich saffron color. North of the Iroquois area, extending from Labrador to the Rocky mts., there is found a pipe of uniform pattern, the bowl of which, having the form of an acorn, rests on a keel-like base which has one to five holes bored through its narrowest part, one of which was designed for holding a string attached to the stem to prevent it from being lost in the snow, the others for the suspension of ornaments.

The Alaskan Eskimo pipe is of peculiar shape and apparently owes its origin to Asiatic influence. The bowl, made of metal, stone, bone, or ivory, holds but a pinch of tobacco, while the large curved stem often consists of two pieces of wood held together by rawhide. Some of these pipes have small plates set in their stems which can be opened for the purpose of cleaning or to collect the liquid in order to mix it with fresh tobacco. Some Eskimo pipes are made from walrus or fossil ivory, and are elaborately engraved with fishing and hunting scenes. Pipes of this character are now made for sale, as is the case with very elaborately carved specimens made by the Haida and Tlingit. Among the many American pipes none is more remarkable than those belonging to the biconical type, found in Canada and along the Mississippi. Some of these are perfectly plain, others are elaborately carved in imitation of men and animals. The term "biconical" has been employed for the reason that both bowl and stem perforations are of cone shape, the smaller end of the cones meeting at approximately the center of the specimens, at a right angle to each other. The most artistically finished of all American pipes are those of the mound type, of which Squier and Davis (Ancient Monuments, 152, 1848) found more than 200 in a single mound in Ohio. These pipes apparently were smoked without stems, although they show no marks of the teeth. The stems as a rule are not ornamented, though the bowls are carved with great skill in imitation of birds, frogs, turtles, beaver, men, etc.

Another typical and delicately fashioned stone pipe is found in the middle Atlantic states; it has a flat base, the bowl being generally but not always at a right angle to the stem. The bowl, which is large in comparison with other pipes from this section, is rarely ornamented but is usually highly polished.

The tomahawk or hatchet pipe is made of metal; it is provided with an eye to receive a handle, and a sharp blade for use in cutting wood or as an offensive weapon. The poll of the hatchet, shaped like an acorn, is hollow and has a hole in the base, connecting with an opening extending through the helve, through which the smoke was drawn. Many of these pipes were inlaid with silver in ornamental design. These tomahawk or hatchet pipes largely displaced the stone pipe and the stone ax, relieving the natives of much weight while traveling. Who first made use of the metal tomahawk it is impossible to say; but from the shape of the blade it is probable that the crescent form was of Spanish origin, the blade resembling the lily was of French derivation, while the simple hatchet was English, for each of these nations armed their Indian allies with these most effective weapons.

OHIO, STONE, LENGTH, 2 1/2 IN. (SQUIER AND DAVIS)

There are unique types of pipes found in various parts of the country, particularly in Georgia and the Carolinas, some of which appear to have followed copper originals and some to have been influenced by European models. In Maryland shell-heaps there has been found a type of pipe, to which it is difficult to assign a date, resembling the trade pipes that were made in large quantities in England, France, Italy, Holland, and Germany to supply the demand during the early colonial period, many of the latter being distinguishable by designs or initials. Pipsissewa. A popular name for Chimaphila umbellata, first mentioned by Dr B. S. Barton, in his Collections towards a Materia Medica of the United States (1798), and since variously corrupted to pkipsessiva, psisera, pipsisseway, etc. The plant once enjoyed a great reputation as a lithontriptic among some of the Wood Cree, who raised it to the dignity of an animate object and spoke of as pipsisikweu, 'it reduces it (stone in the bladder) to very fine particles.' Pipsissewa beer is a decoction of Chimaphila, with the addition of sugar to sweeten it, ginger to flavor it, and yeast to produce fermentation. This drink has been used in scrofulous affections. Piqua. The name of two or more former Shawnee villages in Ohio, occupied by the Piqua division of the tribe: (1) The earlier town, which was the birthplace of the noted Tecumtha, was situated on the N. side of Mad r., about 5 m. W. of the present Springfield, in Clark co. It was destroyed by the Kentuckians under Gen. G. R. Clark in 1780, and never rebuilt, the Indians removing to the (Great) Miami r., where they established two new towns known as Upper and Lower Piqua. (2) Upper Piqua was on Miami r., 3 m. N. of the present Piqua in Miami co., and on the site of the former Miami town of Pickawillanee, q. v. (3) Lower Piqua was a smaller village on the site of the great town of that name. Both villages were within the territory ceded by the treaty of Greenville in 1795, after which the Shawnee retired to Wapakoneta. See Howe, Hist. Coll. Ohio, 1896-98. For synonyms see Piqua, above. (J. M.)

Little Pickaway.—Flint, Ind. Wars, 151, 1833. Pikawa.—Harmar (1790) quoted by Rupp, West. Penn., app., 227, 1846.

Piros. Formerly one of the principal Pueblo tribes of New Mexico, which in the early part of the 17th century comprised two divisions, one inhabiting the Rio Grande valley from the present town of San Marcial, Socorro co., northward to within about 50 m. of Albuquerque, where the Tigua settlements began; the other division, sometimes called Tompíros and Salineros, occupying an area E. of the Rio Grande in the vicinity of the salt lagoons, or salinas, where they adjoined the eastern group of Tigua settlements on the S. The western or Rio Grande branch of the tribe was visited by members of Coronado's expedition in 1540, by Chamuscado in 1580, by Espejo in 1583 (who found them in 10 villages along the river and in others near by), by Oñate in 1598, and by Benavides in 1621-30, the latter stating that they were in 14 pueblos along the river. Judging from the numerous villages of the province of Atripuy (q. v.) mentioned by Oñate, which appears to have been the name applied to the range of the Rio Grande division of the Píros, Benavides' number does not seem to be exaggerated. The establishment of missions among the Píros began in 1626. In that year the most southerly church and monastery in New Mexico were built at Senecu by Arteaga and Zuñiga (to whom are attributed the planting of the first vines and the manufacture of wine in this region), and during the same year missions at Sevilleta, Socorro, and probably also at Alamillo were founded. It is not improbable that the Píros of the Rio Grande, although said to number 6,000 in 1630, were already seriously harassed by the persistent hostility of the Apache, for Sevilleta had been depopulated and destroyed by fire "in consequence of intertribal wars" prior to the establishment of the missions, and was not resettled until about 1626. Moreover, the 14 villages along the Rio Grande occupied by the Píros in 1630 were reduced to 4 half a century later. "This was due not only to the efforts of the missionaries to gather their flock into larger pueblos," says Bandelier, "but also to the danger to which these Indians were exposed from the Apaches of the 'Perrillo' and the 'Gila,' as the southern bands of that restless tribe were called."

The area occupied by the Píros of the Salinas extended from the pueblo of Abo S. E. to and including the pueblo of Tabira, commonly but improperly called "Gran Quivira," a distance of about 25 m. The habitat of the eastern Píros was even more desert in character than that of the eastern Tigua, which bounded it on the N., for the Arroyo de Abo, on which Abo pueblo was situated, was the only perennial stream in the region, the inhabitants of Tabira and Tenabo depending entirely on the storage of rain water for their supply. In addition to the 3 pueblos named, it is not improbable that the now ruined villages known by the Spanish names Pueblo Blanco, Pueblo Colorado, and Pueblo de la Parida were among the 11 inhabited settlements of the Salinas seen by Chamuscado in 1580, but at least 3 of this number were occupied by the Tigua. Juan de Oñate, in 1598, also visited the pueblos of the Salinas, and to Fray Francisco de San Miguel, a chaplain of Oñate's army, was assigned the Píros country as part of his mission district. The headquarters of this priest being at Pecos, it is not likely that much active mission work was done among the Píros during his incumbency, which covered only about 3 years. The first actual missions among the Píros pueblos of the Salinas were established in 1629 by Francisco de Acevedo at Abo and Tabira, and probably also at Tenabo, but before the massive-walled churches and monasteries were completed, the village dwellers of both the Salinas and the Rio Grande suffered so seriously from the depredations of the Apache, that Senecu on the Rio Grande, as well as every pueblo of the Salinas, was deserted before the Pueblo insurrection of 1680. Prior to the raid on Senecu by the Apache in 1675, 6 of the inhabitants of that village were executed for the massacre of the alcalde-mayor and 4 other Spaniards. Probably on account of the fear with which the Spaniards were known to be regarded by the Píros after this occurrence, they were not invited by the northern Pueblos to participate in the revolt against the Spaniards in 1680; consequently when Otermin, the governor, retreated from Santa Fé to El Paso in that year, he was joined by nearly all the inhabitants of Socorro, Sevilleta, and Alamillo. These, with the former occupants of Senecu, who, since the destruction of their village by the Apache had resided at Socorro, were afterward established in the new villages of Socorro, Texas, and Senecu del Sur in Chihuahua, on the Rio Grande below El Paso, where their remnants still survive. In attempting to reconquer New Mexico in the following year, Otermin caused Alamillo to be burned, because the few remaining inhabitants fled on his approach. Only 3 families remained at Sevilleta when the Spaniards retreated, but these had departed and the pueblo was almost in ruins on their return in 1681.

The entire Piros division of the Tanoan family probably numbered about 9,000 early in the 17th century. Of these, only about 60 individuals are known to survive.

Living with or near the Piros of the Salinas in the 16th and 17th centuries were a band of Jumano (q. v.), a semi-nomadic tribe of which little is known. The proximity of these Indians to the Piros pueblos led to the error, on the part of cartographers of that period, of confounding the Jumano and Piros, hence the references on many early maps to the "Humanos de Tompiros," etc.

Following is a list of Piros pueblos, so far as known, all of them being now extinct with the exception of Senecu del Sur, while Socorro has become "Mexicanized": Abo, Agua Nueva, Alamillo, Barrancas, Qualacu, San Felipe, San Pascual, Senecu, Senecu del Sur (also Tigua), Sevilleta, Socorro or Pilabo, Socorro del Sur, Tabira, Tenabo, Teypana, Tenaquel.

The following pueblos, now extinct, were probably also occupied by the Piros: Amo, Aponitre, Aquicabo, Atepua, Ayqui, Calciati, Canocan, Cantensapue, Cunquelipinoy, Encaquiagualcaca, Huertas, Peixoloe, Pencoana, Penjeacu, Pesquis, Peytre, Polooa, Preguey, Pueblo Blanco, Pueblo Colorado, Pueblo de la Parida, Pueblo del Alto, Queelquelu, Quialpo, Quiapo, Quiomaqui, Quiubaco, Teca-hanqualahamo, Teeytraan, Tercao, Texa, Teyaxa, Tohol, Trelagu, Trelaquepu, Treyey, Treypual, Trula, Tuzahé, Vumahein, Yancomo, Zumaque.

The following pueblos, now also extinct, were inhabited either by the Piros or the Tigua: Acoli, Aggey, Alle, Amaxa, Apena, Atuyama, Axauti, Chein, Cizen-tetpi, Couna, Dhiu, Hohota, Mejia, Quanquiz, Salineta, San Francisco, San Juan Bautista, Xatoe, Xiamela, Yonalus.

Pishquitpah. A Shahaptian tribe mentioned by Lewis and Clark as living in 1805 on the N. side of Columbia r. at Muscleshell rapid and wintering on Tap-teal (Yakima) r., Wash. They numbered 2,600 (1,600?), in 71 mat houses, subsisted by hunting and fishing, and did not flatten their heads so much as the tribes farther down the river. They are described as of good stature, "pleasantly featured," and well proportioned. Both men and women rode well. The women wore skirts reaching to the knees, long leggings and moccasins, and large robes. Mooney (14th Rep. B. A. E., 739, 1896) regards them as probably identical with the Pisko band of the Yakima. (L. F.)

Pispiza-wicáaa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 218, 1897. Pispiza-witocaa.—Ibid.

Pispogutt. A village of Christian Indians, probably Nauset, in 1674 (Bourne, 1674, in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., I, 198, 1806). It seems to have been in w. Barnstable co., Mass., near Buzzards bay, and may be identical with Pocasset.

Pisqueno. A Chumashan village on one of the Santa Barbara ids., Cal., probably Santa Rosa, in 1542.—Cabrillo, Narr. (1542), in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 186, 1857.

Pisquows (probably from the Yakima pisko, 'bend in the river'). Originally a Salish tribe on Wenatchee or Pisquows r., a western tributary of the Columbia in the present Kittitas and Okanogan cos., Washington. Gibbs states that by 1853 they were so largely intermarried with the Yakima as to have almost lost their identity. Gibbs, Hale, and most subsequent authors have employed the term in a collective sense. The former made it include "the Indians on the Columbia between the Priest's and Ross' rapids on the Pisuouse or Winatshapam r., the Ent-at-kwu, Chelan lake, and the Methow or Barrier r." The Pisquows proper or the remnant of them are now on the Yakima res., Wash. Their bands were Camilt paw, Siapkat, Shallattoo, Shan-wappom, Skaddal, and Squannaroo. See Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 736, 1896. Pichons.—Wilkes, West Am., 104, 1849. Pisca-hooc.—Lane in Sen. Ex. Pissaccac. The chief village of the Pissasec in 1608, situated on the n. bank of Rappahannock r. above the present Leedstown, in Westmoreland co., Va.

Pissacack.—Simons in Smith (1629), Va., I, 185, repr. 1819. Pissacocack.—Smith, ibid., map.

Pissasec. A tribe or band of the Powhatan confederacy living on the n. bank of Rappahannock r. in King George and Westmoreland cos., Va. They formed part of the Matchotic tribe. Their principal village was Pissacocac.

Pissaseck.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Pissasack.—Simons, ibid., 185. Pissassecs.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 128, 1816 (misprint).

Pissuh (cognate with Chippewa pj̄u, 'lynx.'—W. J.). A gens of the Abnaki. Pezo.—J. D. Prince, inf'n, 1905 (modern St Francis Abnaki form). Pj̄u.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906 (Chippewa form). Pis-suh'.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 174, 1877.

Pistchin. A Clallam village on Pysht r., Wash., which flows into Juan de Fuca strait. Starling erroneously states that the "Macaws and Pist-chins speak the same language."

Pisht.—Eels in Smithsonian. Rep. 1887, 608, 1889.

Pishtot.—Stevens in Ind. Aff. Rep., 450, 1854.

Pishtat.—U. S. Ind. Treat., 800, 1873. Pist-chin.—Starling in Ind. Aff. Rep., 170, 1852. Pist chins.—Ibid., 172.

Pitac. A former rancheria of the Pima on the Gila r., s. Ariz., visited by Father Garcés in 1770 (Arricivita, 1791, quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. M., 387, 1889). Cf. Petaikuk.

Pitahauerat ('down stream,' or 'east.'—Grinnell). One of the tribes of the Pawnee confederacy. The French spoke of them as Tapage Pawnee, and in a treaty with the U. S. in 1819 the tribe is designated as Noisy Pawnees. The Pitahauerat always placed their villages toward the e., or downstream, from the Chaui, and are spoken of as the lower villages. At one time the tribe lived on Smoky Hill r., w. Kans., and later rejoined their kindred on Loup r., Nebr., where their reservation was established in 1857. In 1876 they were removed to Oklahoma, where they now live. Their lands have been allotted in severalty, and they are citizens of the U. S. In their village organization, customs, and beliefs, they did not differ from the other Pawnee. According to Grinnell the tribe is divided into the Pitahauerat proper and the Kawarakish. (A. C. F.)

Treaties, 649, 1873 (misprint). Witaháwigatá.—La Flesche quoted by Dorsey in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., vi, 413, 1892 (Omaha name).

Pitahauerat. One of the two divisions of the Pitahauerat, or Tapaje Pawnee, the other being the Kawarakish.—Grinnell, Pawnee Hero Stories, 241, 1889.

Pitahay. A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, met by Massanet (Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 94, MS.), in 1691, 11 leagues E. of middle Nueces, r., Texas, together with Pacuache, Payavan, Patavo, Patsau, and other tribes. (H. E. B.)

Pitas. A former tribe of N. E. Mexico or S. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, gathered into the mission of Nuestra Señora de los Dolores de la Punta, at Lampazos, Nuevo Leon.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864.

Pitaya (local contraction of pitahaya, the fruit of the Cereus giganteus, and the cactus itself). A former Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, in S. Arizona, in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Pitchibourenik. A tribe or supposed tribe formerly residing near the E. side of James bay, Canada; probably a band of the Cree.

Pitchlynn, Peter Perkins. A prominent Choctaw chief of mixed blood, born at the Indian town of Hushookwa, Noxubee co., Miss., Jan. 30, 1806; died in Washington, D. C., Jan. 17, 1881. His father, John Pitchlynn, was a white man and an interpreter commissioned by Gen. Washington; his mother, Sophia Folsom, a Choctaw woman. While still a boy, seeing a partially educated member of his tribe write a letter, he resolved that he too would become educated, and although the nearest school was in Tennessee, 200 m. from his father's cabin, he managed to attend it for a season. Returning home at the close of the first quarter, he found his people negotiating a treaty with the general Government. As he considered the terms of this treaty a fraud upon his tribe, he refused to shake hands with Gen. Jackson, who had the matter in charge in behalf of the Washington authorities. Subsequently he entered an academy at Columbia, Tenn., and finally was graduated at the University of Nashville. Although he never changed his opinion regarding the treaty, he became a strong friend of Jackson, who was a trustee of the latter institution. On returning to his home in Mississippi, Pitchlynn became a farmer, built a cabin, and married Miss Rhoda Folsom, a Choctaw, the ceremony being performed by a Christian minister. By his example and influence polygamy was abandoned by his people. He was selected by the Choctaw council in 1824 to enforce the restriction of the sale of spirituous liquors according to the treaty of Doaks Stand, Miss., Oct. 18, 1820, and in one year the traffic had ceased. As a reward for his services he was made a captain and elected a member of the National Council, when the United States Government determined to remove the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creeks W. of the Mississippi. His first proposition in that body was to establish a school, and, that the students might become familiar with the manners and customs of white people, it was located near Georgetown, Ky., rather than within the limits of the Choctaw country. Here it flourished for many years, supported by the funds of the nation. Pitchlynn was appointed one of the delegation sent to Indian Ter. in 1828 to select the lands for their future homes and to make peace with the Osage, his tact and courage making his mission entirely successful. He later emigrated to the new reservation with his people and built a cabin on Arkansas r. Pitchlynn was an admirer of Henry Clay, whom he met for the first time in 1840. He was ascending the Ohio in a steamboat when Mr Clay came on board at Maysville. The Indian went into the cabin and found two farmers earnestly engaged in talking about their crops. After listening to them with great delight for more than an hour, he turned to his traveling companion, to whom he said: "If that old farmer with an ugly face had only been educated for the law, he would have made one of the greatest men in this country." He soon learned that the "old farmer" was Henry Clay. Charles Dickens, who met Pitchlynn on a steamboat on the Ohio r. in 1842, gives an account of the interview in his American Notes, and calls him a chief; but he was not elected principal chief until 1860. In this capacity he went to Washington to protect the interests of his tribesmen, especially to prosecute their claims against the Government. At the breaking out of the Civil War Pitchlynn returned to Indian Ter., and although anxious that his people should remain neutral, found it impossible to induce them to maintain this position; indeed three of his sons espoused the Confederate cause. He himself remained a Union man to the end of the war, notwithstanding the fact that the Confederates raided his plantation of 600 acres and captured all his cattle, while the emancipation proclamation freed his 100 slaves. He was a natural orator, as his address to the President at the White House in 1855, his speeches before the congressional committees in 1868, and one delivered before a delegation of Quakers at Washington in 1869, abundantly prove. In 1865 he returned to Washington, where he remained as the agent of his people until his death, devoting attention chiefly to pressing the Choctaw claim for lands sold to the United States in 1830. In addition to the treaty of 1820, above referred to, he signed the treaty of Dancing Rabbit, Miss., Sept. 27, 1830, and the treaty of Washington, June 20, 1855; he also witnessed, as principal chief, that of Washington, Apr. 28, 1866. Pitchlynn's first wife having died, he married, at Washington, Mrs Caroline Lombardy, a daughter of Godfrey Eckloff, who with two sons and one daughter survive him, the children by the first marriage having died during their father's lifetime. Pitchlynn became a member of the Lutheran Memorial Church at Washington, and was a regular attendant until his last illness. He was a prominent member of the Masonic order, and on his death the funeral services were conducted in its behalf by Gen. Albert Pike. A monument was erected over his grave in Congressional Cemetery by the Choctaw Nation. In 1842 Pitchlynn was described by Dickens as a handsome man, with black hair, aquiline nose, broad cheek-bones, sunburnt complexion, and bright, keen, dark, and piercing eyes. He was fairly well read, and in both speaking and writing used good English. He was held in high esteem both by the members of his tribe and by all his Washington acquaintances. Pithkwutsians (Pit'-kwū-tsi-ans'). A former Siuslaw village on Siuslaw r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Pitic. A settlement of the Soba on the Rio Altar in n. w. Sonora, Mexico. It was a visita of the Spanish mission Caborca from prior to 1701, with 313 inhabitants in 1730, and the seat of a presidio established about 1753-54. The name was subsequently changed to Altar. A writer in 1702 (Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 138, 139, 1857) says: "This rancheria [Soba] is called Pitquin in the Pima tongue because there is the junction of the two rivers of Tubutama and that of San Ignacio." Rivera, in 1730 (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 514, 1884), classifies it as a pueblo of the Pimas Altos.

Pitiktaujiang. A summer village of the Aivilirmiut Eskimo on Repulse bay, n. extremity of Hudson bay.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 446, 1888.

Pitkachi. One of the northern Yokuts (Mariposan) tribes of s. central California, on the s. side of San Joaquin r., below Millerton, their territory thus adjoining that of the Chukchansi (Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 370, 1877; Merriam in Science, XIX, 915, June 15, 1904). They were spoken of in 1851 as a large and warlike tribe inhabiting the foothills of the Sierra Nevada, on the headwaters of the Mariposa, Chowchilla, Fresno, and San Joaquin (Barbour in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 61, 1853).

Pits. Excavations made in the ground for ovens, houses, reservoirs, caches, traps, shrines, graves, and for other purposes, are very generally found in the neighborhood of Indian habitations, and even for centuries after the abandonment of villages traces of these pits remain. In the W. some tribes still practise the custom of making pits for various purposes. By reason of the numerous roasting pits excavated along its banks, Pit r. in N. California and the Achomawi or "Pit River Indians" of the neighborhood were so named. The practice of roasting food in a small pit (the so-called Gipsy oven) appears to have been a common one among Indians, and such excavations are probably most numerous (see Ovens). Within the habitat of the agave, especially in s. Arizona and N. Sonora, pits several feet in diameter have long been used for roasting the plants to produce mescal (q. v.). The Maidu of N. California gathered grasshoppers and locusts, of which they were very fond, by digging a large shallow pit in a meadow or flat, and then, by setting fire to the grass on all sides, drove the insects into the pit; their wings being burned off by the flames, they were helpless, and were thus collected by the bushel (Dixon). Abandoned field ovens of the Pueblos for roasting at once immense quantities of green corn become mere pits by the falling in of the earth sides, leaving no superficial clew to their former purpose. Some of the depressions around ancient ruins are likewise enigmatic, although some probably were dug originally as reservoirs, as ovens, or for obtaining material for adobe (see Adobe, Food, Irrigation). Storage pits were in general use. Such pits, filled with refuse, have been found on the Baum and Gartner village sites in Ohio (Mills), and from them have been taken much material connected with the daily life of the people; they surrounded the habitations and were lined with straw or bark to receive corn in the ear compactly laid in, or shelled corn in woven bags. The Creek Indians built large storage pits in the ground (see Receptacles, Storage and Caches). Quarry pits for extracting copper, stone, clay, ocher, turquoise, etc., have been observed in localities where these substances occur, and sometimes, as in the L. Superior region, the Flint Ridge deposit in Ohio, and the pipestone quarry of Minnesota, an immense amount of work of this sort has been done (see Mines and Quarries). Occasionally pit traps were made, those of the Navaho consisting of a pocket at the end of a cul de sac of stakes. Burials were often made in pits, in which sometimes a number of bodies were deposited (see Mortuary customs). Cairn graves were formed by scooping a hole in the ground, placing the body therein, and covering with stones. This custom had a wide range. Pit houses are comparatively rare, but are found among the Eskimo, the Maidu of California, and a prehistoric tribe of w. New Mexico (see Habitations). Pits were sometimes dug for use as sweat houses, and the kivas (q. v.) of the Pueblos were usually at least partly underground.

Pivanhonkapi (Pivánhonkapi). A traditional village about 4 m. N. w. of Oraibi pueblo, N. E. Ariz. According to Hopi story Pivanhonkapi and Hushkovi (q. v.) were destroyed by a fire that had been kindled in the San Francisco mts., 90 m. away, at the instance of the chief of Pivanhonkapi and with the aid of the Yaya-ponchatu people, who are said to have been in league with supernatural forces, because the inhabitants of Pivanhonkapi had become degenerate through gambling. Most of the inhabitants were also destroyed; the survivors moved away, occupying several temporary villages during their wanderings, the ruins of which are still to be seen.—Voth, Traditions of the Hopi, 241, 1905.

Pivipa. A former pueblo of the Opata, on the Rio Soyopa, a western branch of the Yaqui, in N. E. Sonora, Mexico (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 343, 1864). Pivipa is now a civilized rancho of 173 inhabitants.

Piwani (Pi-wa'-ni). The Marmot clan of the Chua (Snake) phratry of the Hopi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 38, 1891.

Pizhiki ('Buffalo'). A Chippewa chief, often called Buffalo, his English name, formerly residing on La Pointe or Madeline id., Wis.; born about 1759, died Sept. 7, 1855. He is spoken of as one of the most distinguished chiefs of the Chippewa tribe (Wis. Hist. Coll., iii, 365, 1857); but Warren indicates more closely the scope of his authority by referring to him as "Kechewaishkeen (Great Buffalo), the respected and venerable chief of the La Pointe band [Shaugaumikong] and principal chief of all the Lake Superior and Wisconsin bands" (Minn. Hist. Coll., v, 48, 1885). In one instance he signed a treaty as representative of the St Croix band, and in another in behalf of both the St Croix and La Pointe bands. According to Warren (p. 87) he was the grandson of chief Augdaweos, which seems to have been also the name of his father. When Buffalo was about 10 years of age his family removed to the vicinity of the present Buffalo, N. Y., where they remained two years, then went to Mackinaw, there residing several years, and thence returned to La Pointe. But few of the important incidents of Pizhiki's life are recorded, but he was an informant of Warren, the historian of the Chippewa. His name is signed to the treaties of Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825 ("Gitspee Waskee, le bouf of La Pointe"); Fond du Lac, Wis., Aug. 5, 1826 ("Peezhickee"); St. Peters r. (Wisconsin side), July 29, 1837 ("Pezheke"); La Pointe, Wis., Oct. 4, 1842 ("Gitchiwaisky"); Fond du Lac, Aug. 2, 1847 ("Ke-che-wash-keen"), and La Pointe, Wis., Sept. 30, 1854 ("Ke-chewaish-ke"). Schoolcraft (Personal Mem., 103, 1851) says that "Gitchee Waishkee, the Great First-born" was familiarly called "Pezhickee, or the Buffalo." By the last treaty a section of land was granted to him out of the territory then ceded to the United States. Previous to his death, in 1855, Pizhiki was baptized in the Roman Catholic faith.

To Commissioner Manypenny, who was with him when he died, he presented his pipe and tobacco pouch, desiring him to take them to Washington. He was buried, Sept. 9, in the Catholic cemetery at La Pointe.

A Chippewa chief of the St Croix band, also named "Peezhickee," or Buffalo, signed the treaties of Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825; Fond du Lac, Wis., Aug. 5, 1826, and St Peters r., Wis., July 29, 1837. (C. T.)

Pkhulluwaaithe (Pkqul-lu'-wa-ai-p'q'). A former Yaquina village on the s. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Pkuaiahktauk (P'ku-u'-ni-ugt-ak'). A former Yaquina village on the s. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Plaikni (Plaikni, 'uplanders'). A collective name given by the Klamath to all the Indians on Sprague r., above and below Yaneks, on the Klamath rea., s. w. Oreg. They comprise the majority of the Moloc, many Klamath, and the Shoshonean Walpapi and Yahuskin settled in these parts.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxxv, 1880.

Plaques. See Receptacles.

Playiskey ('town of the turkey'). A former Delaware village in Bucks co., Pa. It probably belonged to the Unalakhtigo division, and may have been on Newhaminy cr.

Plawikit.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 39, 1885. Playiskey.—Deed of 1737 quoted by Day, Penn., 307, 1843.

Pluggy's Town. A former village, named from its chief, which occupied the site of Delaware, Delaware co., Ohio, in 1776. It belonged to a marauding band of Indians, who seem to have been chiefly Mingo. See Butterfield, Washington-Irvine Corr., 9, 1882.

Plummets. A group of prehistoric pendant-like objects of stone, bone, shell, hematite ore, copper, and other materials the origin and use of which have been much discussed (see Problematical Objects). The name plummet is applied because of the resemblance of many specimens to the ordinary builder's plummet, but the shapes are greatly diversified, numerous variants connecting the well-established type forms with other groups of objects, as net sinkers, club heads, pestles, bird-stones, boat-stones, pendant ornaments, etc. Numerous specimens are rudely shaped, but the greater number are highly finished and symmetric, and often graceful in contour. Eccentric forms are sometimes encountered, especially in Florida, and rather rarely the body is carved to represent in formal fashion the head of a duck. Usually there is a shallow encircling groove; occasionally there are two, at the upper end; and in rare cases one or more grooves or ridges encircle the body of the longer specimens at different points, giving a spindle-like effect. Some are grooved at both ends, while many terminate below in conical or nipple-like points. A few are truncated or have a slight depression at the upper end, and rare specimens of the long slender variety have one side flat or slightly hollowed out, suggesting the form of a dugout canoe. Perforations for suspension are observed in numerous cases, indicating affiliation with ordinary pendant ornaments, while some well-finished specimens have neither grooves nor perforations.

The plummets are widely distributed over the country, occurring in great profusion in Florida, in the Mississippi valley, and in California, and are often found associated with human remains in burials. Some were undoubtedly worn on the person, after the manner of pendant ornaments, but there is good reason to believe that many of them were devoted to magic and ceremony, being invested by their owners with extraordinary powers as charms, talismans, amulets, fetishes, etc., capable in one way or another of exerting profound influence on the welfare of the individual, the society, the clan, or the tribe. The Indians of s. California, in whose possession some of these objects are found, believe them to be helpful in war and the chase, in producing rain, in curing the sick, in games of chance, etc. (Henshaw, Yates). It has been suggested that the original plummets may have been net sinkers, or other objects having at first only practical functions, which in time came to be regarded as luck stones or charms, passing gradually into general use as such, with many shades of significance and widely divergent forms. It is worthy of note that the aborigines generally are disposed to attribute magical significance to all old worked stones as well as to all unusual natural shapes. According to Dr Wm. Jones the Chippewa regard these objects with deep veneration. The ancient name of the plummet type was mōjābāwasin, 'a stone (-asin) of human attributes (-ābā-) that casts a spell (mōj-).' Its present name is shingābāwasin, stone of human attributes lying at rest (shing-). K'isis, 'sun,' was applied to a circular disk; and tibi'ki k'isis, 'night sun or moon,' to a crescent perforated at the horns. These three types—plummet, circular, and crescent—went under the general name of ubawānāqnan, 'dream objects.' The phrase tibi'ki k'isis wābawānāqanit means 'one who (wearing the crescent as a necklace) dreams of the moon,' literally, 'one who wears the moon dream object (for his necklace).'

These objects are found in large numbers in the mounds of Florida, and Moore has illustrated numerous specimens in his works. The range of form is apparently greater here than in any other section of the country, each of the several materials used having given rise to peculiar features, although the elongated plummet and spindle shapes prevail. Suspension was apparently effected by passing a knotted cord through the center of a bit of hide, with the knot underneath, and then folding the margins of the hide down over the head of the plummet, where it was fastened by means of a groove cord. Asphaltum was used in completing the work. The occurrence of a number of these plummets of diversified shapes about the waist of a skeleton in a mound seems to indicate that they had been attached to the girdle. A cache of 12 or more specimens of exceptional beauty of form and finish—one carved to represent a duck's head—was obtained by Moore from a mound in Brevard co., Fla. Cushing describes specimens which bear evidence of having been suspended by means of filaments attached to the groove band and brought together in a knot above.

In the mound region of the Mississippi valley plummets are mostly of stone and hematite ore (Squier and Davis, Fowke, Moorehead). They are rare in the Pueblo region, but many are found in California, and much attention has been given to their study (Abbott, Henshaw, Meredith, Putnam, Yates). From the dry bed of a small lake in Sonoma co., drained for agricultural purposes in 1870, many hundreds of these objects were collected, indicating their use either as sinkers for fishing lines or nets or as offerings to the spirits of the water, the keepers of the fish. Perhaps the stones themselves were believed to possess magical power over the finny tribes. It is a noteworthy fact that a number of these objects appear among the collections obtained from supposedly very ancient auriferous gravel deposits in California.

Closely allied to the plummets is a unique group of objects, mostly of slate, resembling half-plummets. The small head, tapering body, and spike-like base or tail suggest somewhat the form of the common lizard; but the analogy is rather closer in many examples with the duck-head plummets, which have one flat side. Although some are slightly grooved at the top for suspension, the presence of a flat side suggests the possibility that they were attached when in use to the surface of some object, as a tablet, a calumet, or a baton. A few examples of kindred objects have the upper end carved to represent the head of some mammal, as a wolf.

Pocahontas (Pocahontes, for Pokahantess, a verbal adjective meaning 'he (or she) is playful,' 'sportive,' apparently a cognate of Chippewa pagaandisi, contracted to pagaandis, and the vowel preceding the one dropped lengthened by compensation, as always happens in such cases. The aspirate h is not a radical element and is not employed in Chippewa. The Chippewa adj. suffix -si becomes -su in the eastern Algonquian dialects. The Chippewa word is used of a person, male or female, who dislikes to work and prefers to spend his or her time in frivolous amusements. The root is adjectival and trisyllabic.—(Gerard). The daughter of Powhatan, chief of a group of Virginian tribes, 1595–1617. Her real name was Matoaka (Matowaka), a word found also in the misspelled form of Matoka and Matoaka. The sole Algonquian root from which the name can be derived is mitaw, 'to play,' 'to amuse one's self;' whence Mitawike, 'she uses (something) to play with,' or 'she amuses herself playing with (something).' It was undoubtedly to her innate fondness for playthings, play, and frolicsome amusement that was due the name given her by her parents, as well as the expression "Pokahantess" used by her father when speaking of her (Gerard).

By reason of the alleged romance of her life, Pocahontas is one of the most famous of American women. Her father's "dearest daughter," a mere girl at the time, she is said to have saved Capt. John Smith from a cruel and ignominious death at the hands of Powhatan's people, whose prisoner he then was; and she is credited with enabling many other Englishmen to escape the wrath and vengeance of her tribespeople. What the truth is about some of her alleged exploits can never be known; some writers have even doubted the episode with Capt. Smith. After the departure of Smith for England in 1609, faith was not kept with the Indians as promised, and Pocahontas, by the aid of a treacherous chief, was decoyed on board the ship of Capt. Argall in the Potomac, carried off to Jamestown (1612), and afterward taken to Werawocomoco, Powhatan's chief place of residence, where a sort of peace was effected and the ransom of Pocahontas agreed upon. While among the Englishmen, however, Pocahontas had become acquainted with John Rolfe, "an honest gentleman, and of good behaviour." These two fell in love, an event which turned out to the satisfaction of everybody, and in Apr. 1613, they were duly married, Pocahontas having been previously converted to Christianity and baptized under the name of "the Lady Rebecca." This alliance was of great advantage to the colonists, for Powhatan kept peace with them until his death. In 1616, Mr and Mrs Rolfe, with her brother-in-law Uttamatomac and several other Indians, accompanied Sir Thomas Dale to England, where, owing to the prevalent misunderstanding of those times concerning the character and government of the American tribes, Mrs Rolfe was received as a "princess." In Mar. 1617, while on board ship at Gravesend ready to start for America with her husband, she fell ill of smallpox, and died about the 22d year of her life. In July 1907, a skeleton, believed to be the remains of Pocahontas, was unearthed within the site of Gravesend Parish church. She left behind her one son, Thomas Rolfe, who was educated by his uncle, Henry Rolfe, in England. Thomas Rolfe afterward went to Virginia, where he acquired wealth and distinction, leaving at his death an only daughter, from whom was descended, on the mother's side, John Randolph of Roanoke (1773–1833). Other distinguished Virginians are also said to claim descent from Pocahontas. She was called Pocahontas, Capt. John Smith says, "because that the savages did think that, did we know her real name, we should have the power of casting an evil eye upon her."

Strachey, the first secretary of the colony, gives some details (Hist. Trav. Va. Brit., 1849) regarding the early life and marriage of Pocahontas to an Indian chief, named Kocoum, previous to her union with Rolfe.

Pocan. One of the names of the poke-weed (Phytolacca decandra), also known as pocan-bush; practically the same word as puccoon (q. v.) and of the same origin, from a Virginian dialect of Algonquian. See Poke. (A. F. C.)

Pocapawmet. A Massachusetts village, in 1614, on the s. shore of Massachusetts bay.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., vi, 108, 1837.

Pocasset ('where a strait widens out'; cf. Paugusset). A former Wampanoag village about the site of Tiverton, Newport co., R. I., and Fall River, Mass., ruled in 1675 by the woman chief Westamore, sister-in-law of King Philip. A part of the site, within the boundaries of Massachusetts, was afterward set aside as a reservation under the name of Free-town or Fall River res., and contained 59 mixed-blood inhabitants in 1764 and 37 in 1848. They were sometimes also known as Troy Indians. Consult Dubuque, Fall River Ind. Res., 1907.

Pocol. A former Diegueño rancheria near San Diego, s. Cal.—Ortega (1775) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 254, 1884.

Pocomtuc. A tribe formerly living on Deerfield and Connecticut rs., in Franklin co., Mass. Their principal village, of the same name, was near the present Deerfield, and they were frequently known as Deerfield Indians. They had a fort on Ft Hill in the same vicinity, which was destroyed by the Mohawk after a hard battle in 1666. They were an important tribe, and seem to have ruled over all the other Indians of the Connecticut valley within the limits of Massachusetts, including those at Agawam, Nonotuc, and Squawkeag. They combined with the Narraganset and Tunxis in the attacks on Uncas, the Mohegan chief. All these joined the hostile Indians under King Philip in 1675, and at the close of the war in the following year fled to Scaticook, on the Hudson, where some of them remained until about 1754, when they joined the Indians in the French interest at St Francis, Quebec. Podunk. Defined by Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 791, 1877) as "a term applied to an imaginary place in burlesque writing or speaking." This word appears as a place name in both Connecticut and Massachusetts, occurring as early as 1687 in its present form, and in the forms Potaecke and Potunke in 1636 and 1671 respectively. It is the name of a brook in Connecticut and of a pond in Brookfield, Mass., and the meadows thereabout had also this name. It is derived from either the Mohegan or the Massachusetts dialect of Algonquian. The word is identical with Potunk, a Long Island place-name which, according to Rutenber (Ind. Geog. Names, 100, 1906), is presumably a corruption of P^utuk-okke, 'a neck or corner of land'. (A. F. C.)

Podunk. A band or small tribe on Podunk r., in Hartford co., Conn., closely related to the Poquonnoc. Their principal village, also called Podunk, was at the mouth of that river. They seem to have gone off with the hostile Indians at the close of King Philip's war in 1676, and never to have returned. (J. M.)

Poele. A Chumashan village on one of the Santa Barbara idls., Cal., probably Santa Rosa, in 1542.—Cabrillo, Narr. (1542), in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 186, 1857.

Poele (Po-e'-lo). Said by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 393, 1877) to be a tribe, related to the Paiute, on Kern r. slough, S. E. Cal., but it is more probably merely a place name. The section mentioned is in Mariposan (Yokuts) territory.

Poetry. Most Indian rituals can be classed as poetry. They always relate to serious subjects and are expressed in dignified language, and the words chosen to clothe the thought generally make rhythm. The lines frequently open with an exclamation, a word which heralds the thought about to be uttered. Prose rituals are always intoned, and the delivery brings out the rhythmic character of the composition. Rituals that are sung differ from those that are intoned in that the words, in order to conform to the music, are drawn out by vowel prolongations. If the music is in the form of the chant, but little adjustment is required beyond the doubling or prolonging of vowels; but if the music is in the form of the song, the treatment of the words is more complex; the musical phrase will determine the length of a line, and the number of musical phrases in the song the number of lines to the stanza. To meet the requirements of the musical phrase the vowels in some of the words will be prolonged or doubled, or vocables will be added to bring the line to the measure required by the music. In many instances similar or rhyming vocables are placed at the close of recurring musical phrases. This device seems to indicate a desire to have the word sound recur with the repetition of the same musical phrase, affording an interesting suggestion as to one of the possible ways in which metric verse arose. Where vocables are added to fill out the measure of a line, or are exclusively used in the singing of a phrase or a song, they are regarded as being unchangeable as words, and no liberties are ever taken with them.

The same treatment of words in their relation to the musical phrase is observed in the secular songs of tribes. In those sung by the various societies at their gatherings, or those which accompany the vocations of men or women in love songs, war songs, hunting songs, or mystery songs, the musical phrase in every instance fixes the rhythm and measure, and the words and vocables are made to conform to it. In many of these songs the words are few, but they have been carefully chosen with reference to their capability of conveying the thought of the composer in a manner that, to the native's mind, will be poetic, not prosaic. Moreover, the vocables used to fill out the measure are selected so as to harmonize with the thought that the words and music jointly seek to convey; they are flowing when the emotion is gentle or supplicating, but broken and sharp when defiance or aggression is the theme. The picturesque quality of Indian speech lends itself to poetic conceits and expressions. The few words of a song will, to the Indian, portray a cosmic belief, present the mystery of death, or evoke the memory of joy or grief; to him the terse words project the thought or emotion from the background of his tribal life and experience, and make the song vibrant with poetic meaning.

Many of the rites observed among the natives, from the Arctic ocean to the Gulf of Mexico, are highly poetic in their significance, symbolism, and ceremonial movements; the rituals and accompanying acts, the songs whose rhythm is accentuated by the waving of feathered emblems, the postures and marches, and the altar decorations combine to make up dramas of deep significance, replete with poetic thought and expression.

The peculiarities of Indian languages and the forms in which the Indian has cast his poetic thought, particularly in song, make it impossible to reproduce them literally in a foreign language; nevertheless they can be adequately translated. In the poetry of the Indian are blended his beliefs, social usages, traditions of ancient environment, and his views of nature, making a record of great human interest. Pogamoggan. A club, cudgel, war-club: from Chippewa pāgūmāgan or pūgūmāgan (according to dialect), meaning, literally,

'(what is) used for striking'. The cognate word, pikūmdgan, is used by the Cree as a name for a hammer or mallet. See Clubs, Tomahawks. (W. R. G.)

Pogatacut. A sachem of the Manhasset of Long Id., who signed the deed of East Hampton in 1648. In the same year his name was written Poygratasuck. He was a brother of the chief of the same name who died in 1651, and whose body, on the way to the grave, was set down between Sag Harbor and East Hampton. At the spot where his head rested was made the "Sachem's Hole," which was kept clear by the Indians until destroyed in building a turnpike. Consult Rittenber, Tribes Hudson R., 75, 1872; *N. Y. Poghaden. See Pogy, Pauhagen.

Pogie. See Pogy, Porgy.

Pogonip. A Shoshonean term used in Nevada to designate a peculiar fog that occasionally visits the mountain country in winter. The sun is obscured, usually during the entire day, and sometimes for days, while the air is charged with a heavy fog in which fine particles of snow seem to be flying. Although the temperature may not be low, intense cold is felt on account of the unusual humidity that prevails. It is said that the Indians greatly fear these fogs.

Pogoreshapka (Russian: 'burnt cap'). An Ikogmiut Eskimo village on the right bank of the lower Yukon, about 20 m. from Koscrefski, Alaska; pop. 121 in 1880. Gagara-Shapka.—Dall, Inf'n (Russian: 'loon cap'; name applied to a village where the natives made birdskin caps, for which Pogoreshapka is a mistake). Pogoreshapka.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 12, 1884.

Pogromni (Russian: 'desolation'). An Aleut village near Pogromni volcano, on the N. shore of Unimak id., E. Aleutian ids., Alaska.—Lutke (1828) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Pogy. A northern New England name for the menhaden; also applied to a fishing boat. A trap for menhaden fishing is known as pogy-catcher. The word is either identical with porgy (q. v.) or corrupted from poghaden, a variant of pauhagen, another name of this fish. It is spelled also pogie and poggie. (A. F. C.)

Pohallintinleh (Pohalin tinlin, 'at the squirrels' holes.'—A. L. K.). A name given by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 370, 1877) as that of a Mariposan (Yokuts) tribe living a little S. of Ft Tejon, near Kern lake, Cal., but it is really only the name of a locality.

Pohonichi. A name applied to those Indians of the Moquelumnan family who formerly lived during the summer months in Yosemite valley, Cal. The name is derived from Pohono, the Indian name for Bridalveil fall in Yosemite valley. These people lived during the cold season in the Sierra foot-hills along Merced r. Of the original group of people to which the term was applied there are now (1906) but two or three survivors. (S. A. B.)

Poihuinge. A large prehistoric Tewa pueblo, now ruins, on the summit of a small but lofty mesa about 1 m. S. of Chama r. and 4 m. W. of its confluence with the Rio Grande, in Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. The pueblo was built of adobe and irregular blocks of the heavy black lava of which the mesas in this region are composed. It was built in three sections, about a court, the S. side being open. There were two circular kivas within the court and two outside at some distance from the building. The site is strongly defensive, but the water and food supply must have been precarious, there being no possibility of agriculture and no stream nearer than the valley a mile away. Consult Hewett in Bull. 32, B. A. E., 33, 1907. (E. L. H.)

Poisons. Plant and animal poisons were known generally among the Indians, this knowledge growing out of the familiarity with the environment characteristic of American tribes. Plant poisons were commonly employed as an aid in capturing fish. The Cherokee pounded walnut bark and threw it into small streams to stupefy the fish so that they might be easily dipped out in baskets as they floated on the surface of the water (Mooney). Among other Southeastern Indians fishing was carried on by poisoning the streams with certain roots (a species of Tephrosia was most commonly used), so that the stupefied fish could be secured by means of bows and long-shafted arrows (Speck). Powers says of the California Indians: "When the summer heat dries up the streams to stagnant pools they rub poisonous soap root in the water until the fish are stupefied, when they easily scoop them up, and the poison will not affect the tough stomachs of the aborigines." The root is pounded fine and mixed into the water; buckeyes were used in the same manner by both western and eastern Indians. Goldard states, however, that the Hupa do not use fish poisons. Heckewelder says that the Naticoke invented fish poison, and were reputed skilful in destroying human life by means of poison. Obviously the use of poison for taking human life is a subject that yields little confirmatory evidence. Powers states that he could not discover that the Indians of California "ever used poisons to any considerable extent to rid themselves of their enemies; if they did, it was the old shamans, and they kept the matter a secret." He also says that the Indians were very much afraid of poison. According to Mooney, among the Cherokee the poisonous wild parsnip was used for conjuration and poisoning, and individuals are said to have eaten it in order to commit suicide. Pope (q. v.), the leader of the Pueblo Indians in the insurrection of 1680, is said to have been killed by poison, but the character of the poison is not stated. Cushing says the Zuni poisoned certain springs at the entrance of their valley with yucca juice and cactus spines, which caused suffering and death among the forces of Diego de Vargas, as recorded by the narrators of his expedition in 1692. Priests among the Yokuts of California drank a decoction of roots of Datura meteloides to produce religious frenzy, and this poisonous drink sometimes caused death from overdose (Powers). The Hopi, Navaho, and other tribes of the S. W. are acquainted with the poisonous properties of the Datura, which the Hopi say was used by their sorcerers. Arrow poison of vegetal and animal origin was generally known. The Lipan Apache dipped their arrows into the sap of Yucca angustifolia, which they say is poisonous (Hoffman), and the Kaniagmiut Eskimo and the Aleut poisoned their arrows and lance-points with a preparation of aconite, by drying and pulverizing the root, mixing the powder with water, and, when it fermented, applying it to their weapons (Mason). The Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763) describes a plant, called mago by the Opata of Sonora, the milk of which was used by these Indians for arrow poison. The character indicates a euphorbia. Castañeda relates that a member of Coronado's expedition of 1540 was wounded by a poisoned arrow; "the skin rotted and fell off until it left the bones and sinews bare, with a horrible smell. The wound was in the wrist, and the poison had reached as far as the shoulder when he was cured. The skin on all this fell off." The antidote used was the juice of the quince. The expedition lost 17 men from arrow wounds during a punitive raid in Sonora. "They would die in agony from only a small wound, the bodies breaking out with an insupportable pestilential stink." Hoffman says the Jova, Seri, Apache, Blackfeet, Kainah, Piegan, and Teton Sioux employ rattlesnake venom. "The Shoshoni and Bannock Indians state that the proper way to poison arrows, as formerly practised by them, is to secure a deer and cause it to be bitten by a rattlesnake, immediately after which the victim is killed, the meat removed and placed in a hole in the ground. After the mass has become putrid the arrowpoints are dipped into it. By this method the serpent venom is supposed to be the most essential in the operation; but it is extremely doubtful if the venom has time to fully enter into the circulation in the short interval between the time that the victim is bitten and then killed. If the method was actually practised by these Indians, as they affirm it was, and only for the destruction of noxious beasts, the poison of the putrescent matter may have caused death by septicemia." Hoffman cites many other instances of the use of arrow poison and concludes that some of the Indian tribes applied to their arrows harmful substances which from observation they knew were deadly. McGee asserts that the Seri did not use arrow poison as such, but rather as a substance which by magic power produced death and that this power was given the substance through conjuration employed in its preparation, though he says the Seri arrow preparation is "sometimes septic in fact" on account of the decomposing matter of which it is made.

Pojoaque (Po-hua'-ki). The smallest pueblo occupied by the Tewa of New Mexico in recent times; situated on a small eastern tributary of the Rio Grande, about 18 m. n. w. of Santa Fé. It became the seat of the Spanish mission of San Francisco early in the 17th century. After the Pueblo rebellions of 1680 and 1696 it was abandoned, but was resettled with 5 families by order of the governor of New Mexico in 1706, when it became the mission of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe. In 1760 it was reduced to a visita of the Nambe mission; but in 1782 it again became a mission, with Nambe and Tesuque as its visitas. In 1712 its population was 79; in 1890 it was only 20; since 1900 it has become extinct as a Tewa pueblo, the houses now being in possession of Mexican families. See Pueblos, Tanoan, Tewa. (F. W. Pokagon. A Potawatomi village, taking its name from a prominent chief, in Berrien co., Mich., near the w. bank of St Joseph r. just n. of the Indiana line. The tract on which it was situated was ceded to the United States by the treaty of Chicago, Sept. 26-27, 1833.

Pokagon, Simon. The last chief of the Pokagon band of Potawatomi, born in 1830 at their old village 1 m. from St Joseph r., Berrien co., Mich.; died in Allegan co., Mich., Jan. 27, 1899. His father, Leopold Pokagon, was chief for 12 years and signed several important treaties with the United States in behalf of his tribe, that of Tippecanoe r., Oct. 26, 1832, being the one by which the site of Chicago came into possession of the whites. Simon was 10 years of age when his father died, and on reaching his 14th year was sent to school at Notre Dame, Ind., for 3 years; then, encouraged by his mother in his desire for education, attended Oberlin College, Ohio, for a year, and next went to Twinsburg, Ohio, where he remained 2 years. It is said that he was educated for the priesthood, spoke four or five languages, and bore the reputation of being the best educated full-blood Indian of his time. He wrote numerous articles for the leading magazines, and delivered many addresses of merit during the last quarter of the 19th century. In 1899 he published in book form "Ogimawkwe Mitigwäki (Queen of the Woods)," an account of the wooing of his first wife, and at the World's Fair in Chicago, in 1893, "The Red Man's Greeting," a booklet of birch-bark. He was a poet, and the last of his verses, both in its English and Potawatomi versions, appeared in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, Jan. 23, 1899, just before his death. Pokagon was credited with ably managing the affairs of his 300 tribesmen scattered through Michigan, and, inspired by enlightened views, was the means of promoting their welfare. He pressed and finally collected a Potawatomi claim for $150,000 from the United States. He was a man of sturdy character, unostentatious in manner, of simple habit, and a consistent Catholic. A monument has been erected by the citizens of Chicago in Jackson Park to the memory of Simon and his father. (C. T.)

Pokanoket. The principal settlement of the Wampanoag tribe, and the residence of Massasoit and King Philip; situated on the E. side of Narragansett bay, on the Bristol peninsula, Rhode Id. The site has been variously described as at Mount Hope, Bristol, Warren, and Barrington, all of which may easily be correct, as Indian settlements were seldom compactly built, and all the places named are within 3 m. of a central point. The etymology of the name is uncertain, one writer making it mean 'a wood,' while another makes it 'a clearing,' and a third 'land over the water.' It was also sometimes known to the English under variant forms of Sowams, which Tooker, with apparent reason, makes a general term for 'southwest' (i. e. from Plymouth), rather than the specific name of a settlement. It was abandoned on the breaking out of King Philip's war in 1675. A brochure, Massasoit's Town Sowams in Pokanoket, by Virginia Baker, was issued at Warren in 1904. (J. M.)

Pokeloken. Defined by Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 478, 1877) as "an Indian word used by hunters and lumbermen in Maine and New Brunswick to denote a marshy place or stagnant pool extending into the land from a stream or lake." A New Brunswick place name, Popelogan, Pocologan, or Poclagain, is derived from pecelaygan, 'a place for stopping' (?) in the Malecite dialect of Algonquian, by Ganong (Roy. Soc. Can., 263, 1896). Tooker, in his discussion of poquosin, considers pokeloken to be derived from the same radical. See Bogan. (A. F. C.)

Polishing implements. Many of the implements, ornaments, and other artifacts of the native tribes were given a high degree of finish by the use of polishing implements. These necessarily varied in form, material, and texture, according to the material and form of the object treated. Wood, bone, stone, metal, and earthenware each required distinct treatment, and special forms of polishing implements were employed. The arrowshaft of wood was polished with an implement of stone grooved for the purpose; the earthen vessel was given its even surface by rubbing with a smooth pebble or bit of wood, gourd, bone, or shell. The countless implements, ornaments, pipes, and miscellaneous sculptures of the aborigines were finished with the aid of polishers of varying forms and textures, while many objects received their finishing touches by rubbing with a piece of deerskin, fishskin, or other variously textured but pliable material, or even with the hand, and the high polish of many forms of implements comes from long-continued use, as in digging in the soil, or in contact with a haft or the hand. In many cases natural objects, such as pebbles, shells, etc., were employed in the polishing work; but it is not always easy to identify these, and the same is true of many polishers that have been artificially shaped. An interesting form of rubbing implement of clay is found occasionally in Tennessee: the discoid base, a few inches in diameter, has a convex under-surface, and above it is supplied with a cylindrical or looped handle; the convex surface is usually worn quite smooth from use, hence it is surmised that the implement was employed in smoothing earthenware or the clay plastering of walls. A few examples are of stone. In the shaping of stone the polishing work usually follows the more roughly abrading or grinding operations, the implements as well as the processes employed in the one passing by insensible gradations into those of the other.

Polishing implements are described incidentally in numerous works and articles on ethnology and archeology, many of which are referred to under Archeology and Stonework. See also Abrading implements. (W. H. H.)

Pomeioc. An Algonquian palisaded village in 1585, about the mouth of Gibbs cr., in the present Hyde co., N. C. It was one of the villages drawn in color by John White during his visit to Virginia in 1585 as a member of Raleigh's first expedition, now preserved in the British Museum, and illustrated by De Bry. The houses of the village were "covered and enclosed, some wth matts, and some wth barks of trees. All compassed about wth small poles stock thick together in stead of a wall." Pomo. The name of the Indian linguistic stock, technically known as Kulanapan (q. v.), living in parts of Sonoma, Lake, Mendocino, Colusa, and Glenn cos., Cal. In the northern Pomo dialect Pomo means 'people,' and added to a place name forms the name for a group of people. Although Poma is almost as frequently heard as Pomo, the latter has come into general use in both scientific and popular literature.

The territory occupied by the Pomo is in two parts: a main area which extends, generally speaking, from w. to e., from the coast to the crest of the main range of the Coast Range mts., and from s. to n., from the vicinity of Santa Rosa to Sherwood valley on the upper course of Fcl r.; the second area is a very small one, lying wholly within the Sacramento valley drainage and comprising only a limited area on the headwaters of Stony cr. in Colusa and Glenn cos., and is occupied by a people speaking a dialect differing from any of those spoken in the main area to the w. The Pomo thus occupied all of Russian River valley except two small areas, one between Geyserville and Healdsburg, the other at the extreme head of Potter valley, both of which were occupied by people of the Yukian stock. On the w. of the main Pomo area is the Pacific, on the s. is Moquelumnan territory, on the e. are Yukian-Wappo and Wintun areas, and on the n. the Yuki and the Athapascan Kato areas, from which it is separated by the watershed between Cahto and Sherwood valleys.

Certain peoples living to the n. of the Pomo area, generally known by their Pomo names (Kai, Kastel, Kato, and Yusal Pomo), are not, as supposed, Pomo, but Athapascan.

There are in all seven dialects, one being found exclusively in the small Pomo area in the Sacramento valley drainage, the remainder lying within the limits of what has been designated as the main Pomo area. Of the latter six dialects two are confined to the vicinity of Clear lake, one to the southern part of the coast held by the Pomo, and one almost entirely to the lower course of Russian r., while the other two occupy portions of the interior valley region along Russian and Fcl rs. and also portions of the Pomo coast.

In appearance the Pomo resemble the other Indians of n. central California; they are comparatively short, though on the whole they are taller and of more powerful build than their Yuki and Athapascan neighbors immediately to the n. Both men and women, especially the latter, are often fat, with large faces. The women tattoo very slightly, and this chiefly upon the chin. They are noted for their basketry, which in variety of technique and range of patterns is probably unrivaled in North America, while its fineness of finish and elaborateness of decoration, especially with feathers, are remarkable. In their general culture the Pomo are similar to such peoples as the Wintun, Maidu, and Yuki. They are essentially unwarlike.

The Pomo were the most southerly stock on the coast not brought under the mission influence of the Franciscans in the 18th and early 19th centuries, their contact with the mission fathers being only very slight and then in the extreme southern part of their territory. However, Franciscan missionaries have more recently been active among them. A few, especially the so-called Little Lakes and Big Lakes, are at present on the Round Valley res., but the majority are living free from governmental control in or near their old homes, supporting themselves by civilized pursuits, especially farming. Their number at present is about 800. As throughout the greater part of California, true tribes do not exist among the Pomo, their largest political and geographical division being the village and the surrounding land controlled by it. (S. A. B.)

The following names are mentioned by Powers as those of divisions and villages of the Pomo. In many instances, however, this writer attached to village names the significance of those of tribal divisions, while in others the names are those used by whites to designate the Indians of a certain village or a certain valley. The names here given represent a very small portion of the number of villages actually inhabited by the Pomo in aboriginal times: Ballokai Pomo, Bidamarek, Boal-kea, Bokea, Buldam, Cahlahtel Pomo, Chamkhai, Chomchadila, Dahnohabe, Danokha, Dapishul, Erio, Erusi, Gallinonero, Gualala, Haukoma, Hopitsewah, Kaiachim, Kaime, Keliopoma, Khabe-madolil, Khabenapo, Khana, Khawina, Khoalek, Khwakhamaiu, Koi, Komacho, Kulanapo, Laguna, Lema, Makhelchel, Makoma, Masut, Mayi, Mitomkai Pomo, Moiya, Musalakun, Napolatin, Salan Pomo, Shiegho, Shigom, Shodakhai Pomo, Shokhowa, Shutaunomanok, Tabahtea, Tyuga, Ubakhea, Venaambakaia, Wenok, Yapiam, Yokaia Pomo.

As elsewhere in California, villages and larger groups are difficult to distinguish, and true tribes do not exist. The preceding list is therefore not only incomplete, but unsystematic. Pomouic. An Algonquian tribe, living in 1585 on the coast of North Carolina. They were seated on Pamlico r., w. of the Secotan, in what is now Beaufort co. Their principal village, named Pananaioc on White's map, seems to have been about Pungo r. Amadas said of them: "Ad-joining to Secotan beginneth the country Pomouik, belonging to the King called Piamacum, in the Country Nusiok [Neusiok] upon the great river Neus. These have mortall warres with Wingina, King of Wingandacoa. Betwixt Piamacum and the Lord of Secotana peace was concluded; notwithstanding there is a mortall malice in the Secotans, because this Piamacum invited divers men and 30 women to a feast, and when they were altogether merry before their Idoll, which is but a meere illusion of the Devill, they sudainly slew all the men of Secotan and kept the women for their use" (Smith, 1629, Va., I, 85, repr. 1819). In later times the same region was occupied by the Pamlico, and it is not improbable that the two names refer to the same people.

Pomperaug ('place of offering,' referring to an ancient stone-heap "on which each member of the tribe, as he passed that way, dropped a small stone."—Trumbull). A village near Woodbury, Conn., in 1704, and the name of the tract on both sides of Pomperaug r., a branch of the Housatonic, bought by the first planters of Woodbury in 1673 (Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 53, 1881). The inhabitants were allied with those at Scaticook, in Litchfield co.

Pompton. A Munsee band formerly residing on Pompton r., in N. New Jersey. They are first mentioned in a deed of 1695. Memerescum was their chief in 1710. In 1758, when they joined in the treaty of Easton, they were residing at Otsiningo under Seneca protection. In that treaty they are called also Waping or Oping, signifying "eastern," probably either from their former position on the eastern Munsee frontier or perhaps from their having incorporated some remnants of the Wappinger. The meaning of the name is unknown. (J. M.)

Ponca. One of the five tribes of the so-called Dhegiha group of the Siouan family, forming with the Omaha, Osage, and Kansa, the upper Dhegiha or Omaha division. The Ponca and Omaha have the Omaha group took place, the Osage settling on that stream, and the Kansa continuing up Missouri r., while the Omaha and Ponca crossed to the N. side. The course of the latter is given from the tradition recorded by J. O. Dorsey (Am. Nat., Mar. 1886) as follows: The Omaha and Ponca, after crossing the Missouri, ascended a tributary of that river, which may have been Chariton r., and finally reached the pipestone quarry in S. W. Minnesota. All the traditions agree in stating that the people built earth lodges or permanent villages, cultivated the soil, and hunted buffalo and other animals. When game became scarce they abandoned their villages and moved N. W. On reaching a place where game was plentiful, other villages were built and occupied for years. Thus they lived and moved until they reached the pipestone quarry. After reaching Big Sioux r. they built a fort. The Dakota made war on the Omaha and their allies, defeating them and compelling them to flee S. W. until they reached L. Andes, S. Dak. There, according to Omaha and Ponca tradition, the sacred pipes were given and the present gentes constituted. From this place they ascended the Missouri to the mouth of White r., S. Dak. There the Iowa and Omaha remained, but the Ponca crossed the Missouri and went on to Little Missouri r. and the region of the Black hills. They subsequently rejoined their allies, and all descended the Missouri on its right bank to the mouth of Niobrara r., where the final separation took place. The Ponca remained there and the Omaha settled on Bow cr., Nebr., while the Iowa went down the Missouri to the site of Ionia, Dixon co., Nebr. The Pana, who on Marquette's autograph map (1673) are placed near the Omaha, apparently on the Missouri about the mouth of the Niobrara, are supposed to be the Ponca. If so, this is the earliest historical mention of the tribe. They were met by Lewis and Clark in 1804, when their number, which had been greatly reduced by smallpox toward the close of the 18th century, was estimated at only 200. This number, however, may not include those who had taken refuge with the Omaha. Lewis and Clark (Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, VI, 88, 1905) say that they formerly resided on a branch of Red r. of the North, but as this statement is at variance with all other authorities, and as the wording of the sentence is almost identical with that relating to the Cheyenne (ibid., 100), there is probably a confusion of tribes. They increased rapidly, however, reaching about 600 in 1829 and some 800 in 1842; in 1871, when they were first visited by Dorsey, they numbered 747. Up to this time the Ponca and Sioux were amicable, but a dispute grew out of the same language, differing only in some dialectic forms and approximating the Quapaw rather than the Kansa and Osage languages. The early history of the tribe is the same as that of the other tribes of the group, and, after the first separation, is identical with that of the Omaha. After the migration of the combined body to the mouth of Osage r. the first division of the cession of lands, and the Sioux made annual raids on the Ponca until the enforced removal of the tribe to Indian Ter. took place in 1877. Through this warfare more than a quarter of the Ponca lost their lives. The displacement of this tribe from lands owned by them in fee simple attracted attention, and a commission was appointed by President Hayes in 1880 to inquire into the matter; the commission visited the Ponca settlements in Indian Ter. and on the Niobrara, and effected a satisfactory arrangement of the affairs of the tribe, through which the greater portion (some 600) remained in Indian Ter., while some 225 kept their reservation in Nebraska. The two bands now (1906) number, respectively, 570 and 263; total, 833. Their lands have been allotted to them in severalty. For the treaties made by the Ponca, see Treaties. The divisions or gentes as given by Morgan (Anc. Soc., 155, 1877) are as follows, the names following in parentheses being the proper forms or definitions according to La Flesche: 1, Wasabe, 'grizzly bear' (properly black bear); 2, Deagheta (Dhihida), 'many people'; 3, Nakopozna (Nikapashna), 'elk'; 4, Mohkuh, 'skunk' (Moukou, 'medicine'); 5, Washaba, 'buffalo'; 6, Wazhazha, 'snake'; 7, Nohga, 'medicine' (Nooghe, 'ice'); 8, Wahga, 'ice' (Waga, 'jerked meat'). According to Dorsey, the tribe is divided into two half-tribes, Chizhu and Wazhazhe. Each half-tribe contains 4 gentes: I. Chizhu half-tribe: 1, Hisada; 2, Wasabehitazhi; 3, Dhihida; 4, Nikapashna. II. Wazhazhe half-tribe: 5, Makan; 6, Washabe; 7, Wazhazhe; 8, Nukhe. (J. O. D. C. T.) Dhit.—Gatschet, MS., B. A. E. (Pawnee name). Ka'ka.—Dorsey, Winnebago MS. vocab., B. A. Pone. Among the Powhatan tribes, a ball or flat round cake made of a paste of corn-meal and hot water, covered with hot ashes in a fire-bed until baked, then immediately dipped in water to clean it, and afterward allowed to dry by its own heat; or, a similar cake made from the flour obtained from certain edible roots and seeds, and sometimes "buttered" with deer's suet (rúnga). The cake was sometimes put into a pot and boiled, and afterward laid upon a smooth stone and allowed to harden. (2) A kind of bread or cake made of corn-meal, milk, and eggs; called also corn pone. (3) A cake made of grated sweet potatoes, sugar, and spices, and called sweet-potato pone. The word is from Powhatan ápán '(something) baked', from ápen 'she bakes'; cognate with Middle States Lenape ápán, Munsee áchpán, Caniba (Norridgewock) abá'n, Passamaquoddy ábán. (W. R. G.)

Poniards. See Daggers.

Ponida (Po'-ni-da). A former Jova pueblo situated on a small stream between the Rio Batepito and the Chihuahua boundary, lat. 29° 10', lon. 110° 50', E. Sonora, Mexico (Doc. of 1764 quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 510, 1892). The place, which is now civilized, contained 153 inhabitants in 1900.

Poningo. The principal village of the Siwanoy in 1640, situated near the present Rye, Westchester co., N. Y.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 367, 1872.

Ponoetaneo ('lower men', i. e. 'down-river men'). A local name now used by the Cheyenne of Cantonment and the upper Canadian, Okla., to designate those living farther down the river, in the neighborhood of Darlington. In Hayden's time (ca. 1860) it appears to have been employed by the Northern Cheyenne to designate those of the Southern group. It is not a true divisional name. (J. M.)

Ponokiz (Po-no-kiz, 'elk'). Given by Morgan (Anc. Soc., 171, 1877) as a division of the Kainah tribe of the Siksika. Cf. Siksinokaks, 'Black Elks'.

Ponpon. A former village of the Yuchi in s. w. South Carolina.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 61, 1848.

Pontiac. An Ottawa chief, born about 1720, probably on Maumee r., Ohio, about the mouth of the Auglaize. Though his paternity is not positively established, it is most likely that his father was an Ottawa chief and his mother a Chippewa woman. J. Wimer (Events in Ind. Hist., 155, 1842) says that as early as 1746 he commanded the Indians—mostly Ottawa—who defended Detroit against the attack of the northern tribes. It is supposed he led the Ottawa and Chippewa warriors at Braddock's defeat. He first appears prominently in history at his meeting with Maj. Robert Rogers, in 1760, at the place where Cleveland, Ohio, now stands. This officer had been dispatched to take possession of Detroit on behalf of the British. Pontiac objected to the further invasion of the territory, but, learning that the French had been defeated in Canada, consented to the surrender of Detroit to the British, and was the means of preventing an attack on the latter by a body of Indians at the mouth of the strait. That which gives him most prominence in history and forms the chief episode of his life is the plan he devised for a general uprising of the Indians and the destruction of the forts and settlements of the British. He was for a time disposed to be on terms of friendship with the British and consented to acknowledge King George, but only as an "uncle," not as a superior. Failing to receive the recognition he considered his due as a great sovereign, and being deceived by the rumor that the French were preparing for the reconquest of their American possessions, he resolved to put his scheme into operation. Having brought to his aid most of the tribes n. w. of the Ohio, his plan was to make a sudden attack on all the British posts on the lakes at once—at St Joseph, Ouiatenon, Michilimackinac, and Detroit—as well as on the Miami and Sandusky, and also attack the forts at Niagara, Presque Isle, Le Boeuf, Venango, and Pitt (Du Quesne). The taking of Detroit was to be his special task. The end of May 1763 was the appointed time when each tribe was to attack the nearest fort and, after killing the garrison, to fall on the adjacent settlements. It was not long before the posts at Sandusky, St Joseph, Miami (Ft Wayne), Ouiatenon, Michilimackinac, Presque Isle, Le Boeuf, and Venango were taken and the garrison in most cases massacred; but the main points, Detroit and Ft Pitt, were successfully defended and the Indians forced to raise the siege. This was a severe blow to Pontiac, but his hopes were finally crushed by the receipt of a letter from M. Neyon, commander of Ft Chartres, advising him to desist from further warfare, as peace had been concluded between France and Great Britain. However, unwilling to abandon entirely his hope of driving back the British, he made an attempt to incite the tribes along the Mississippi to join in another effort. Being unsuccessful in this attempt, he finally made peace at Detroit, Aug. 17, 1765. In 1769 he attended a drinking carousal at Cahokia, Ill., where he was murdered by a Kaskaskia Indian. Pontiac, if not fully the equal of Tecumseh, stands closely second to him in strength of mind and breadth of comprehension.

Pontotoc. A former Chickasaw settlement in n. Mississippi, apparently at or near the site of the present Pontotoc, Pontotoc co.

Ponyinumbu (Po-nyi Num-bu). A very ancient pueblo of the Tewa, the ruins of which are in the vicinity of the Mexican settlement of Santa Cruz, in n. Santa Fé co., N. Mex.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 83, 1892.

Ponyipakuen (P'o-nyi Pa-kuen). A former pueblo of the Tewa in the vicinity of Ojo Caliente and El Rito, about the boundary of Taos and Rio Arriba cos., N. Mex.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 83, 1892.

Poodatook (Mohegan: Poun-tuckuck, 'country about the falls.'—Trumbull). A former village, subject to the Paugusset, on Housatonic r., near Newtown, Fairfield co., Conn. About 1660 it contained about 250 inhabitants, who afterward decreased and joined the Scaticook farther up the river. In 1761 only 2 or 3 families remained in Newtown. Ruttenber calls it a Stockbridge village. The Moravians had a mission there.

Pooquaw. A name used on the island of Nantucket for the round clam (Venus mercenaria). As its earlier form pequaock indicates, this word is a reduction of the Indian name of this shellfish in the Algonquian dialects of New England, the Narraganset poquaühock or the Massachusetts poquahoc signifying literally 'thick or tightly closed shell', from po-quah, 'thick or tightly closed', and -hock, 'that which covers.' Roger Williams (1643) calls the Narraganset poquaühock a horsefish. (A. F. C.)

Pooscoostekale (probably Puskus Takali, 'hanging child.'—Halbert). A former Choctaw town, mentioned by Romans as having been deserted in 1771. It was

s. w. by w. from Concha, and so seems to have been in the s. w. corner of Kemper co., Miss., though possibly in Neshoba co. Poosecos to Kalé.—Romans, Florida, 811, 1775. Poosecos Tokali.—Ibid., map.

Poose-back. A word reported as used in w. Connecticut to designate the Indian woman's manner of carrying a child on the back (Babbitt, Dial. Notes, 342, 1894); from poppoone. The second component is the English back. (A. F. C.)

Poosepatuck. Also called Uncachogue. One of the 13 tribes of Long Island, N. Y., probably subordinate to the Montauk. They occupied the s. shore from Patchogue E. to the Shinnecock country. In 1693 a reservation was ceded to their sachem, Tobaccous, on Forge r., a short distance above the town of Mastie, where a few mixed-bloods still survive, with no knowledge of their language or customs, on a state reservation of 50 acres. Elizabeth Joe, their woman sachem and last chief, died in 1832. In 1890 they numbered 10 families, governed by 3 trustees. See Patchong. (F. O. S.)

Pooshapukanuk. A former Choctaw settlement, including Mt. Dexter, probably in Marion co., Miss. It was the scene of the treaty of Nov. 16, 1805.—Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., 1, 749, 1832.

Pope (Po-pé). A celebrated Tewa medicine-man, native of the pueblo of San Juan, who first appears in New Mexico history in 1675 as a leader either of some prisoners charged with witchcraft, and with killing several missionaries, or of a party that visited the Spanish governor at Santa Fé in that year demanding their release. Later making Taos the seat of his efforts, he quietly preached the doctrine of independence of Spanish authority and the restoration of the old Pueblo life, which developed into a plot to murder or drive from the country the 2,400 Spanish colonists and priests. Chief among Pope's adherents were Catiti of Santo Domingo, Tupatú of Picuris, and Jaca of Taos. The plot quickly spread among the Pueblos, meeting with enthusiasm as it went. Aug. 13, 1680, was the day set for the onslaught, and the news was communicated by runners, even to the far-off Hopi in Arizona, by means of a knotted string; but for some reason the Piro of the lower Rio Grande were not invited to join in the massacre. Every precaution was taken to keep from the Spaniards all news of the proposed revolt; no woman was permitted to know of it, and, because suspected of treachery, Pope put his own brother-in-law to death. Nevertheless the news leaked out, and Pope's only hope of success was to strike at once. The blow came on Aug. 10. Four hundred Spanish colonists, including 21 priests, were murdered, and Santa Fé was besieged, its thousand inhabitants taking refuge with Gov. Antonio de Otermín in the official buildings. Here they remained until the 20th, when a sortie made by 100 of the men resulted in the rout of the Indians, 200 being killed and 47 captured and hanged in the plaza of the town. The following day the Spaniards abandoned Santa Fé and began their long retreat down the Rio Grande to El Paso.

Having accomplished this much, Pope set about to realize the rest of his dream. Those who had been baptized as Christians were washed with yucca suds; the Spanish language and all baptismal names were prohibited; where not already consumed by the burning of the churches, all Christian objects were destroyed, and everything done to restore the old order of things. This project of obliterating everything Spanish from the life and thought of the Indians met with the same enthusiasm as that with which the plan of revolt had been received, and for a time Pope, dressed in ceremonial garb as he went from pueblo to pueblo, was everywhere received with honor. His success, however, had been more than he could stand. Assuming the rôle of a despot, he put to death those who refused to obey his commands, and took the most beautiful women for himself and his captains. Then the old enemies of the Pueblos intervened—drought, and the Apache and Ute, who took advantage of the absence of the Spaniards to resume their forays. Internal dissension also arose. The Keresan tribes and the Taos and Pecos people fought against the Tewa and Tanos, and the latter deposed Pope on account of his lordly demands, electing to his place Luis Tupatú, who ruled the Tewa and Tanos until 1688, when Pope was again elected; but he died before the reconquest of the province by Vargas in 1692. See Prophets, Pueblos.

Popcum.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 160, 1901. Popkum.—Ibid., 309, 1879.

Popof (named for Vasili and Ivan Popof, traders and hunters in 1762-63). An Aleut fishing settlement at Pirate cove, Popof id., one of the Shumagins, Alaska; pop. 7 in 1880, 146 in 1890 (including another settlement at Humboldt harbor).—11th Census, Alaska, 85, 1893.

Poponesset. A village of Christian Indians in 1674 near Poponesset bay, Barnstable co., Mass. Its inhabitants were probably a part of the Nauset.

Pawpocait.—Bourne (1674) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., I, 197, 1806. Popponesset.—Freeman (1792), ibid., 231. Popponessit.—Freeman (1792), ibid., 231.

Popotita ('where there is popote', a stiff straw). A Huichol rancheria and religious place about 15 m. s. w. of San Andrés Coamiata, q. v.

Epithápa.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 72, 1902 (Huichol name, referring to a kind of stiff grass).

Popotita.—Ibid.

Popular fallacies. Since the day when Columbus miscalled the aborigines of America "Indians," believing that he had discovered India, popular fallacies respecting them have been numerous and widespread. Some of the more important of them will be discussed here.

Origin of the Indians.—As soon as, or even before, the newly discovered continent was found to be not connected with Asia, theories of the origin of the Indians began to be formulated by the learned, and, consistently with the religious spirit of the age, a solution of the problem was sought in Hebrew tradition. In the Indians were recognized the descendants of the "lost tribes of Israel." The latest and most earnest supporters of the Hebrew origin are the Mormons, whose statements are alleged to have the authority of direct revelation. Absurd as the theory is in the light of present knowledge, anthropology owes to it several valuable treatises on the habits and characteristics of the Indians, which it could ill afford to lose, notably Lord Kingsborough's Mexican Antiquities (1830-48) and Adair's History of the North American Indians (1775), the latter book being filled with fancied similarities to Jewish customs, rites, and even traditions. (See Lost Ten Tribes.)

Equally absurd, but less widespread, was the myth of a tribe of Welsh Indians, descendants of a colony reputed to have been founded by Prince Madoc about 1170. The myth placed them, with their Welsh language and Welsh Bible, first on the Atlantic coast, where they were identified with the Tuscarora, and then farther and farther w., until about 1776 we find the Welsh, or "white," Indians on the Missouri, where they appeared as the Mandan (according to Catlin), and later on Red r. Later still they were identified with the Hopi of Arizona, and finally with the Modoc of Oregon, after which they vanish. (See Croatan; White Indians; consult Mooney in Am. Anthropol., IV, 393, 1891, and Bowen, America Discovered by the Welsh, 1876.)

Other seekers of a foreign origin for the American aborigines have derived them in turn from Greeks, Chinese, Japanese, Phenicians, Irish, Polynesians, and even from the peoples of Australasia. Most of these theories are based on fortuitous analogies in habits, institutions, and arts; but the attempt is frequently made to strengthen them by alleged similarities of language. The general similarity of the human mind in similar stages of culture in every part of the world, with its proneness to produce similar arts, institutions, religious ideas, myths, and even material products, sufficiently explains the former class of facts, whilst the hypotheses of identity of language, based, as they invariably are, on a small number of verbal similarities in the nature of coincidences, are wholly disproved on adequate examination and analysis.

Indian languages.—Indian languages are so utterly unlike European speech in sound and so different in structure and character that it is not surprising that erroneous conceptions concerning them should arise. The unlearned conceived the idea that the speech of all Indians of whatsoever tribe was practically the same, that it was little more than a sort of gibberish, that it contained but a small number of words, that to eke out its shortcomings the Indian was compelled to use gestures, that it was hardly human speech, much less orderly and well developed language.

A comprehension of the manifold variety of Indian linguistic families, embracing a multitude of languages and dialects, of their rich vocabularies, flexible grammatical methods, and general sufficiency to express any and all concepts the Indian mind is capable of entertaining, above all, of their capacity, shared with more advanced tongues, of indefinite expansion corresponding to culture growth, was reserved for a later period and more complete study. The intricacies of Indian languages are even yet but partially understood; their proper study has hardly begun, so vast is the field.

Indians not nomadic.—One of the common fallacies of early historians, by no means yet entirely dissipated, was the idea that the Indians were generally nomadic, having no fixed place of abode, but wandering hither and yon as fancy or the necessities of existence demanded. The term nomadic is not, in fact, properly applicable to any Indian tribe. Every tribe and every congeries of tribes, with exceptions to be noted, laid claim to and dwelt within the limits of a certain tract or region, the boundaries of which were well understood, and were handed down by tradition and not ordinarily relinquished save to a superior force. Between many of the tribes, indeed, were debatable areas, owned by none but claimed by all, which from time immemorial formed the cause of disputes and intertribal wars. Most or all of the tribes E. of the Mississippi except in the N., and some W. of it, were to a greater or less extent agricultural and depended much for food on the products of their tillage. During the hunting season such tribes or villages broke up into small parties and dispersed over their domains more or less widely in search of game; or they visited the seashore for fish and shellfish. Only in this restricted sense may they be said to be nomadic. The so-called "horse Indians" and the Plains Indians, at least after the latter acquired the horse, wandered very widely in search of their chief dependence, the buffalo. Though most of these had no fixed and permanent villages, they yet possessed some idea as to the extent of their own territory as well as that of their neighbors. The Athapascan and Algonquian tribes of the far N., where absence of agriculture, the wide expanses of desolate territory, and the nature of the game necessitated frequent changes of abode and forbade any form of fixed village life, most nearly approached nomadic life.

Indian ownership of land.—The exact nature of Indian ownership of land appears not to have been understood by the early settlers, and the misunderstanding was the fruitful source of trouble and even bloodshed. Neither the individual Indian nor the family possessed vested rights in land. The land belonged to the tribe as a whole, but individual families and clans might appropriate for their own use and tillage any portion of the tribe's unoccupied domain. Hence it was impossible for a chief, family, clan, or any section of a tribe legally to sell or to give away to aliens, white or red, any part of the tribal domain, and the inevitable consequence of illegal sales or gifts was bad feeling, followed often by repudiation of the contract by the tribe as a whole. Attempts by the whites to enforce these supposed legal sales were followed by disorder and bloodshed, often by prolonged wars. (See Land Tenure.)

Ideas of royalty.—It is perhaps not strange that the early emigrants to America, habituated to European ideas of royal descent and kingly prerogative, should describe the simple village and tribal organizations of the Indians with high-sounding phrases. Early treatises on the Indians teem with the terms "king," "queen," and "princess," and even with ideas of hereditary privilege and rank. It would be difficult to imagine states of society more unlike than one implied by such terms and the simple democracy of most of the Indians. On the N. W. coast and among some tribes of the S. Atlantic region ideas of caste had gained a foothold, principally founded on a property basis, but this was exceptional. Equality and independence were the cardinal principles of Indian society. In some tribes, as the Iroquois, certain of the highest chieftaincies were confined to certain clans, and these may be said in a modified sense to have been hereditary, and there were also hereditary chieftaincies among the Apache, Chippewa, Sioux, and other tribes. Practically, however, the offices within the limits of the tribal government were purely elective. The ability of the candidates, their courage, eloquence, previous services, above all, their personal popularity, formed the basis for election to any and all offices. Except among the Natchez and a few other tribes of the lower Mississippi, no power in any wise analogous to that of the despot, no rank savoring of inheritance, as we understand the term, existed among our Indians. Even military service was not compulsory, but he who would might organize a war party, and the courage and known prowess in war of the leader chiefly determined the number of his followers. So loose were the ties of authority on the warpath that a bad dream or an unlucky presage was enough to diminish the number of the war party at any time or even to break it up entirely.

The idea prevalent among the colonists of a legal executive head over the Indians, a so-called king, was acceptable on account of the aid it lent to the transaction of business with the Indians, especially to the enforcement of contracts. It enabled the colonists to treat directly and effectively with one man, or at most with a few, for the sale of land, instead of with the tribe as a whole. The fact is that social and political organization was of the lowest kind; the very name of tribe, with implication of a body bound together by social ties and under some central authority, is of very uncertain application. (See Chiefs.)

Knowledge of medicine.—Many erroneous ideas of the practice of medicine among the Indians are current, often fostered by quacks who claim to have received herbs and methods of practice from noted Indian doctors. The medical art among all Indians was rooted in sorcery; and the prevailing idea that diseases were caused by the presence or acts of evil spirits, which could be removed only by sorcery and incantation, controlled diagnosis and treatment. This conception gave rise to both priest and physician. Combined with it there grew up a certain knowledge of and dependence upon simples, one important development of which was what we know as the doctrine of signatures, according to which, in some cases, the color, shape, and markings of plants are supposed to indicate the organs for which in disease they are supposed to be specifics. There was current in many tribes, especially among the old women, a rude knowledge of the therapeutic use of a considerable number of plants and roots, and of the sweating process, which was employed with little discrimination. (See Medicine and Medicine-men.)

The Great Spirit.—Among the many erroneous conceptions regarding the Indian none has taken deeper root than the one which ascribes to him belief in an overruling deity, the "Great Spirit." Very far removed from this tremendous conception of one all-powerful deity was the Indian belief in a multitude of spirits that dwelt in animate and inanimate objects, to propitiate which was the chief object of his supplications and sacrifices. To none of his deities did the Indian ascribe moral good or evil. His religion was practical. The spirits were the source of good or bad fortune whether on the hunting path or the war trail, in the pursuit of a wife or in a ball game. If successful he adored, offered sacrifices, and made valuable presents. If unsuccessful he cast his manito away and offered his faith to more powerful or more friendly deities.

In this world of spirits the Indian dwelt in perpetual fear. He feared to offend the spirits of the mountains, of the dark wood, of the lake, of the prairie. The real Indian was a different creature from the joyous and untrammelled savage pictured and envied by the poet and philosopher. (See Mythology, Nanabozho, Religion.)

Happy hunting ground.—If the term be understood to imply nothing more than a belief of the Indian in a future existence, it answers, perhaps, as well as another. That the Indian believes in a future life his mortuary rites abundantly testify. It may be confidently stated that no tribe of American Indians was without some idea of a life after death, but as to its exact nature and whereabouts the Indian's ideas, differing in different tribes, were vague. Nor does it appear that belief in a future life had any marked influence on the daily life and conduct of the individual. The American Indian seems not to have evolved the idea of hell and future punishment.

Division of labor.—The position of woman in Indian society, especially as regards the division of labor, has been misunderstood. Historians have generally pictured her as a drudge and slave, toiling incessantly, while her indolent husband idles away most of the time and exists chiefly by the fruits of her labor. While the picture is not wholly false, it is much overdrawn, chiefly because the observations which suggest it were made about the camp or village, in which and in the neighboring fields lay the peculiar province of woman's activity. In addition to the nurture of children, their duties were the erection and care of the habitation, cooking, preparation of skins, and the making of clothing, pottery, and basketry, and among many tribes they were expected also to help bring home the spoils of the chase. Among agricultural tribes generally tillage of the fields was largely woman's work. Thus her tasks were many and laborious, but she had her hours for gossip and for special women's games. In an Indian community, where the food question is always a serious one, there can be no idle hands. The women were aided in their round of tasks by the children and the old men. Where slavery existed their toil was further lightened by the aid of slaves, and in other tribes captives were often compelled to aid in the women's work.

The men did all the hunting, fishing, and trapping, which in savagery are always toilsome, frequently dangerous, and not rarely fatal, especially in winter. The man alone bore arms, and to him belonged the chances and dangers of war. The making and administration of laws, the conduct of treaties, and the general regulation of tribal affairs were in the hands of the men, though in these fields woman also had important prerogatives. To men were intrusted all the important ceremonies and most of the religious rites, also the task of memorizing tribal records and treaties, as well as rituals, which involved astonishing feats of memory. The chief manual labor of the men was the manufacture of hunting and war implements, an important occupation that took much time. The manufacture of canoes, also, was chiefly man's work, and, indeed, in some tribes the men did the skin dressing and even made their wives' clothing.

Thus, in Indian society, the position of woman was usually subordinate, and the lines of demarcation between the duties of the sexes were everywhere sharply drawn. Nevertheless, the division of labor was not so unequal as it might seem to the casual observer, and it is difficult to understand how the line could have been more fairly drawn in a state of society where the military spirit was so dominant. Indian communities lived in constant danger of attack, and their men, whether in camp or on the march, must ever be ready at a moment's warning to seize their arms and defend their homes and families.

Where Indian communities adopted settled village life, as did the Pueblo peoples, or where the nature of tribal wealth was such as to enable women to become property holders on a large scale, as among the Navaho, whose women own the sheep, or where slavery was an established institution and extensively practised, as among the N. W. coast tribes, the position of women advanced, and there ensued, among other social changes, a more equal division of laborious tasks. (See Labor, Women.)

Degeneracy of mixed-bloods.—It has long been an adage that the mixed-blood is a moral degenerate, exhibiting few or none of the virtues of either, but all the vices of both of the parent stocks. In various parts of the country there are many mixed-bloods of undoubted ability and of high moral standing, and there is no evidence to prove that the low moral status of the average mixed-bloods of the frontier is a necessary result of mixture of blood, but there is much to indicate that it arises chiefly from his unfortunate environment. The mixed-blood often finds little favor with either race, while his superior education and advantages, derived from association with the whites, enable him to outstrip his Indian brother in the pursuit of either good or evil. Absorption into the dominant race is likely to be the fate of the Indian, and there is no reason to fear that when freed from his anomalous environment the mixed-blood will not win an honorable social, industrial, and political place in the national life. (See Mixed-bloods.)

Indian pigmies and giants.—All times and all peoples have had traditions of pigmies and giants. It is therefore no wise surprising that such myths were early transplanted to American soil. The story of an ancient race of pigmies in Tennessee, familiar to most archeologists, owes its origin to the discovery, in the early half of the last century, of numerous small stone coffins or cists containing skeletons. The largest, measured by Featherstonhaugh, was 24 in. long by 9 in. deep. The small size of the cists was assumed by their discoverers to be proof of the existence of a race of dwarfs, and the belief gained ready credence and exists to the present day in the minds of a few. In many cases the skeletons of the supposed dwarfs proved to be those of children, while, as pointed out by Jones and Thomas, the skeletons of the adults found in the cists had been deprived of flesh, a common Indian mortuary custom throughout the mound region, and then disjointed, when the bones of an adult could be packed into very small space.

A race of dwarfs has also been popularly ascribed to the cliff-dweller region of New Mexico and Arizona, partly owing to the finding of shriveled and shrunken mummies of children, too hastily assumed to be those of dwarfs, and partly owing to the discovery of small apartments in the cliff-dwellings, of the nature of cubby-holes for the storage of property, the entrances to which were too small to permit the passage, erect, of an ordinary man; hence, in the mind of the discoverers, they must have been used by dwarfs. The Pueblo peoples are, indeed, of relatively small stature, but they are as far from being dwarfs as other Indians from being giants. (For details respecting the dwarfs of Tennessee, see Haywood, Natural and Aboriginal History of Tennessee, 1823; Jones, Antiquities of Tennessee, 10, 1876.)

The myth of the discovery of giant skeletons, perennial in newspapers, is revived at times by the finding of huge fossil mammalian remains of ancient epochs, erroneously supposed by the ignorant to be human; at others by the discovery of buried skeletons the bones of which have in the course of time become separated, so as to give the impression of beings of unusual height. There was considerable diversity of stature among Indian tribes, some, as the Pueblos, being of rather small size, while among the tribes of the lower Colorado and the Plains were many men of unusual size. Now and then, too, as among other peoples, a man is found who is a real giant among his kind; a skeleton was exhumed in West Virginia which measured 7½ ft in length and 19 in. across the shoulders. (See Anatomy, Physiology.)

Mound-builders and Cliff-dwellers.—The belief was formerly held by many that the mound-builders of the Mississippi valley and the cliff-dwellers of the S. W. border were racially distinct from the Indians or had reached a superior degree of culture. The more thoroughly the mounds and cliff ruins have been explored and the more carefully the artifacts, customs, and culture status of these ancient peoples are studied, the more apparent is it that their attainments were nowise superior to those of the later Indian. There is no evidence incompatible with the theory that the builders of the mounds and the dwellers in the cliffs are the ancestors of the tribes now or recently in possession of the same regions.

Stolidity and taciturnity.—The idea of the Indian, once popular, suggests a taciturn and stolid character, who smoked his pipe in silence and stalked reserved and dignified among his fellows. Unquestionably the Indian of the Atlantic slope differed in many respects from his kinsmen farther w.; it may be that the forest Indian of the N. and E. imbibed something of the spirit of the primeval woods which, deep and gloomy, overspread much of his region. If so, he has no counterpart in the regions w. of the Mississippi. On occasions of ceremony and religion the western Indian can be both dignified and solemn, as befits the occasion; but his nature, if not as bright and sunny as that of the Polynesian, is at least as far removed from moroseness as his disposition is from taciturnity. The Indian of the present day has at least a fair sense of humor, and is very far from being a stranger to jest, laughter, and repartee. (H. W. H.)

Population. The question of the number of the native population of America, and particularly of the United States and British America, at the coming of the white man, has been the subject of much speculation. Extremists on the one hand have imagined a population of millions, while on the other hand the untenable claim has been made, and persistently repeated, that there has been no decrease, but that on the contrary, in spite of removals, wars, epidemics, and dissipation, and the patent fact that the aboriginal population of whole regions has completely disappeared, the Indian has thriven under misfortune and is more numerous to-day than at any former period. The first error is due in part to the tendency to magnify the glory of a vanished past, and in part to the mistaken idea that the numerous ancient remains scattered over the country were built or occupied at practically the same period. The contrary error—that the Indian has increased—is due to several causes, chief of which is the mistake of starting the calculation at too recent a period, usually at the establishment of treaty relations. The fact is that between the discovery of America and the beginning of the federal government the aboriginal population had been subjected to nearly three centuries of destructive influences, which had already wiped out many tribes entirely and reduced many others to mere remnants. Another factor of apparent increase is found in the mixed-blood element, which is officially counted as Indian, although frequently representing only $\frac{1}{16}$, $\frac{1}{32}$, or even $\frac{1}{64}$ of Indian blood, while in the late Indian Ter. (Oklahoma) it is well known that the tribal rolls contain thousands of names repudiated by the former tribal courts. The Indian of the discovery period was a full-blood; the Indian of to-day is very often a mongrel, with not enough of aboriginal blood to be distinguishable in the features, yet, excepting in a few tribes, no official distinction is made.

The chief causes of decrease, in order of importance, may be classed as smallpox and other epidemics; tuberculosis; sexual diseases; whisky and attendant dissipation; removals, starvation and subjection to unaccustomed conditions; low vitality due to mental depression under misfortune; wars. In the category of destroyers all but wars and tuberculosis may be considered to have come from the white man, and the increasing destructiveness of tuberculosis itself is due largely to conditions consequent upon his advent. Smallpox has repeatedly swept over wide areas, sometimes destroying perhaps one-half the native population within its path. One historic smallpox epidemic originating on the upper Missouri in 1781–82 swept northward to Great Slave lake, eastward to L. Superior, and westward to the Pacific. Another, in 1801–02, ravaged from the Rio Grande to Dakota, and another, in 1837–38, reduced the strength of the northern Plains tribes by nearly one-half. A fever visitation about the year 1830 was officially estimated to have killed 70,000 Indians in California, while at about the same time a malarial fever epidemic in Oregon and on the Columbia—said to have been due to the plowing up of the ground at the trading posts—ravaged the tribes of the region and practically exterminated those of Chinookan stock. The destruction by disease and dissipation has been greatest along the Pacific coast, where also the original population was most numerous. In California the enormous decrease from about a quarter of a million to less than 20,000 is due chiefly to the cruelties and wholesale massacres perpetrated by the miners and early settlers. The almost complete extermination of the Aleut is attributable to the same causes during the early Russian period. Confinement in mission establishments has also been fatal to the Indian, in spite of increased comfort in living conditions. Wars in most cases have not greatly diminished the number of Indians. The tribes were in chronic warfare among themselves, so that the balance was nearly even until, as in the notable case of the Iroquois, the acquisition of firearms gave one body an immense superiority over its neighbors. Among the wars most destructive to the Indians may be noted those in Virginia and southern New England, the raids upon the Florida missions by the Carolina settlers and their savage allies, the wars of the Natchez and Foxes with the French, the Creek war, and the war waged by the Iroquois for a period of thirty years upon all the surrounding tribes.

A careful study of population conditions for the whole territory n. of Mexico, taking each geographic section separately, indicates a total population, at the time of the coming of the white man, of nearly 1,150,000 Indians, which is believed to be within 10 per cent of the actual number. Of this total 846,000 were within the limits of the United States proper, 220,000 in British America, 72,000 in Alaska, and 10,000 in Greenland. The original total is now reduced to about 403,000, a decrease of about 65 per cent. The complete study is expected to form the subject of a future Bulletin of the Bureau of American Ethnology. (J. M.)

Poquim, Poquoiam. See Uncas.

Poquonnoc (from paunqu'un-auke, 'a clearing'). A tribe formerly living about the mouth of Farmington r. in Hartford co., Conn. Their principal village, called also Pequonnoc, was near the present Windsor. Paquanocke.—Windsor Rec. (1636-59) cited by Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 55, 1881. Paquan-ug.—Plymouth deed (1637), ibid. Paquanick.—Windsor Rec., op. cit. Pequanucke.—R. I. Col. Rec. (1644) cited by Trumbull, ibid. Poquan'noe.—Trumbull, ibid., 54. Poquanock.—McClure (1797) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., v., 169, 1806. Poquonock.—Windsor Rec., op. cit. Powquanlock.—Ibid.

Poquosin. A name applied in eastern Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina to a low wooded ground or swamp, which is covered with shallow water in winter and remains in a miry condition in summer. Some of these swamps in North Carolina, such as the "Holly Shelter pocoson," are 40 m. in length, and overgrown with great bodies of valuable timber trees, rendered inaccessible to the outer world by reason of overflow and the perpetual miry state of the ground. In Duplin co. in the same state, in which pocosons, or "dismals" as they are also called, abound, there are 105 sq. m. of pure mud swamps, and in Pender co. 206 sq. m. of overflowed land. The name is sometimes applied to a reclaimed swamp. The name is from Renape pūkwasen, a verbal adjective meaning 'it (the land) is in a slightly watered condition.' The word is common to all Algonquian dialects, and in Wood Cree is used substantively as a name for a 'shoal' or 'shallow'. The name is spelled also poaquesson, poquoson, pocuson, perkoson. (W. R. G.)

Porgy. According to Bartlett (Dict. Americanisms, 484, 1877), a name given in New York to a fish (Sparus argyrops) called in Rhode Island and E. Connecticut scup, and in some other parts of New England scuppaug. The dictionaries give porgy the following meanings: 1. Braize (Pagrus vulgaris), scup, pinfish, and margate-fish. 2. Surf-fish of the Pacific coast. 3. Angel-fish. 4. Toad-fish and menhaden. Porgy, spelled also poggy, pogy, pogie, paugie, etc., is a reduction of mishcuppaug, plural of mishcup, in the Narraganset dialect of Algonquian, which Roger Williams (1643) rendered 'breames.' The whites took the plural as a singular and decapitated it, hence porgy, paugie, etc. The decaudated form appears as mishcup in some parts of New England. Gerard, on the other hand, asserts that porgy is "not a corruption of an Indian word, but a name in England for a fish allied to our porgy. It was introduced at an early period, and is mentioned by Josselyn. Catesby gives it also as the name of a Bermuda fish. It was evidently derived from pargus, one of the forms of pagrus, a word of Greek origin." See Mishcup, Pogy. (A. F. C.)

Porphyry. Rock of igneous origin and resembling granite, but characterized by the presence of crystals of quartz and feldspar which, when large and contrasting with the somber matrix, give a very attractive appearance. It was often used by the native tribes in making their heavier implements, and the more showy varieties were selected for the manufacture of ornaments and objects of ceremony. (W. H. H.)

Portage Band. A Winnebago division that resided in 1811 at the portage of Fox and Wisconsin rs., at the present site of Portage, Wis.—Gale, Upper Miss., 185, 1867.

Porter, Pleasant. The last chief of the Creek Nation; born at the family home near the present town of Coweta, n. of Arkansas r., in the Creek Nation, Okla., Sept. 26, 1840, died of paralysis at Vinita, Cherokee Nation, Sept. 3, 1907, while en route to Missouri. His father was a white man, Pleasant Porter inheriting his Indian blood from his mother, who, through her father, Tulope Tustunuggee, of the Big Spring town of Creeks, had a decided strain of negro blood. He was a bright boy, but acquired only a limited education at the old Tallahassee mission school; from wide reading, however, after he became of age, he was regarded as one of the best informed Indians in the entire Indian Ter. When the Civil War broke out many of Porter's relatives and friends espoused the cause of the North and enlisted in its service, but with the majority of the Creeks he entered the service of Potano. A tribe of Timucuan stock formerly occupying an inland territory in N. Florida, about the upper waters of Suwannee r. De Soto passed through their territory in 1539, the French Huguenots found them at war with the Timucua in 1564, and Pareja mentions them in 1612 as speaking a Timucuan dialect. They were later Christianized and gathered into mission villages, which, with those of the Apalachee, were destroyed by the incursions of the savages from the northward in 1701-08. (J. M.)

Potaneu.—Laudonnière (1564) misquoted by Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 518, 1881. Potane.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in Bourne, De Soto Narr., I, 88, 1904; Ranjel (ca. 1546), ibid., II, 70, 1904; Pareja (1612) as quoted by Gatschet in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., XVII, 479, 1890. Potaneu.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 243, 1869. Potavou.—Brinton, Fla. Penin., 119, 1859 (misprint v for n).

Potannumakut. A former Nauset village on Pleasant bay, near Harwich, Barnstable co., Mass. In 1762 it still contained 64 Indians and was, next to Mashpee, the largest Indian village in the county.

Potannumakut.—Rawson and Danforth in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 133, 1809. Potannumakut.—Treaty of 1647, ibid., 4th s., v, 186, 1861. Potannumakut.—Freeman (1792), ibid., 1st s., I, 230, 1806. Potannumakut.—Writer (ca. 1767), ibid., 2d s., III, 14, 1815. Potannumakut.—Stiles (1762), ibid., 1st s., x, 112, 1809.

Potaucao. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, in New Kent co., Va., between the Chickahominy and Pamunkey rs.

Potaucao.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819. Potavneak.—Pots, ibid., 219.

Potawackati. A band, probably Moquelumnan, so called from their chief, formerly residing near the headwaters of Mariposa, Merced, and Tuolumne rs., Cal. Potawackaties.—Barbour et al. (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 60, 1853.

Potawatomi (J. B. Bottineau, speaking Chippewa and Cree fluently, gives Potawamiñk or Potawaganiñk, i. e. 'People of the place of the fire,' as the primary form of the name. This derivation is strongly confirmed by the Huron name Anistague-roñon (Champlain, 1616), for Otañid'ge-roñon, likewise signifying 'People of the place of fire,' which was applied by them to their enemies who dwelt in 1616 on the w. shores of L. Huron. The Jesuit Relation for 1671 (42, 1858) has the following passage: "Four nations make their abode here, namely, those who bear the name Puans (i. e., the Winnebago), who have always lived here as in their own country, and who have been reduced to nothing from being a very flourishing and populous people, having been exterminated by the Illinois, their enemies; the Potawatomi, the Sauk, and the Nation of the Fork (la Fourche) also live here, but as strangers (or foreigners), driven by the fear of Iroquois [The Neuters and Ottawa] from their own lands which are between the lake of the Huron and that of the Illinois." The Jesuit Relations employ the expression "Nation of Fire," until in the one for 1670 (p. 94) occurs the first use of "Maskskouteng," who are represented as living then on Fox r in what is now Wisconsin. Hence, it seems clear that the term "nation of fire" was originally applied to the Potawatomi and their close neighbors, the Sauk and the "Nation of the Fork," dwelling on the w. shore of L. Huron. And since a part at least of the Potawatomi tribe bears the name Maskotens, officially known as the "Prairie Band," and the tribe as a whole was a part of those who were called "People of the Fire," a natural confusion arose as to the application of these two names, and so the term "Fire Nation" at last became permanently affixed to a people whose proper name was "People of the Small Prairie," latterly known as the Mascoutens.—Hewitt). An Algonquian tribe, first encountered on the islands of Green bay, Wis., and at its head. According to the traditions of all three tribes, the Potawatomi, Chippewa, and Ottawa were originally one people, and seem to have reached the region about the upper end of L. Huron together. Here they separated, but the three have sometimes formed a loose confederacy, or have acted in concert, and in 1846 those removed beyond the Mississippi, asserting their former connection, asked to be again united. Warren conjectured that it had been less than three centuries since the Chippewa became disconnected as a distinct tribe from the Ottawa and Potawatomi. In the Jesuit Relation for 1640 the Potawatomi are spoken of as living in the vicinity of the Winnebago. Verwyst (Missionary Labors, 211, 1886) says that in 1641 they were at Sault Ste Marie, fleeing before the Sioux. The Jesuit Relation of 1642, speaking of the meeting of Raymbault and Jogues with the tribes at Sault Ste Marie, says that "a certain nation farther away, which they called Pouteatami, had abandoned its country and taken refuge with the inhabitants of the Sault in order to escape from some other hostile nation which was continually harassing them." At the "feast of the dead" attended by Raymbault and Jogues in 1641, somewhere E. or N. E. of L. Huron, the Chippewa and Potawatomi appear to have been present. In 1667, Allouez met 300 of their warriors at Chaquamegon bay. A portion of them were dwelling in 1670 on the islands in the mouth of Green bay, chiefly about the Jesuit mission of St François Xavier. They were then moving southward, and by the close of the 17th century had established themselves on Milwaukee r., at Chicago, and on St Joseph r., mostly in territory that had previously been held by the Miami. (For their migration from Michigan, see Sauk.) After the conquest of the Illinois, about 1765, they took possession of the part of Illinois lying N. E. of the country seized by the Sauk, Foxes, and Kickapoo, at the same time spreading eastward over southern Michigan and gradually approaching the Wabash. At the treaty of Greenville, in 1795, they notified the Miami that they intended to move down upon the Wabash, which they soon afterward did, in spite of the protests of the Miami, who claimed that whole region. By the beginning of the 19th century they were in possession of the country around the head of L. Michigan, from Milwaukee r. in Wisconsin to Grand r. in Michigan, extending S. W. over a large part of N. Illinois, E. across Michigan to L. Erie, and S. in Indiana to the Wabash and as far down as Pine cr. Within this territory they had about 50 villages. The principal divisions were those of St Joseph r. and Huron r., Mich., Wabash r., and the Prairie band of Potawatomi in Illinois and Wisconsin.

The Potawatomi sided actively with the French down to the peace of 1763; they were prominent in the rising under Pontiac, and on the breaking out of the Revolution in 1775 took arms against the United States and continued hostilities until the treaty of Greenville in 1795. They again took up arms in the British interest in 1812, and made final treaties of peace in 1815. As the settlements rapidly pressed upon them, they sold their land by piecemeal, chiefly between the years 1836 and 1841, and removed beyond the Mississippi. A large part of those residing in Indiana refused to leave their homes until driven out by military force. A part of them escaped into Canada and are now settled on Walpole id. in L. St Clair. Those who went W. were settled partly in W. Iowa and partly in Kansas, the former, with whom were many individuals of other tribes, being known as Prairie Potawatomi, while the others were known as Potawatomi of the Woods. In 1846 they were all united on a reservation in S. Kansas. A part of them was known as the Keotuc band. In 1861 a large part of the tribe took lands in severalty and became known as Citizen Potawatomi, but in 1868 they again removed to a tract in Indian Ter. (Oklahoma), where they now are. The others are still in Kansas, while a considerable body, part of the Prairie band, is yet in Wisconsin, and another band, the Potawatomi of Huron, is in lower Michigan.

The Indians of this tribe are described in the early notices as "the most docile and affectionate toward the French of all the savages of the west." They were also more kindly disposed toward Christianity, besides being more humane and civilized than the other tribes. Tailhan says: "Their natural politeness and readiness to oblige was extended to strangers, which was very rare among these peoples. Up to this time (1864) they have resisted the rum and brandy with which the Anglo-Saxons have poisoned the other tribes." Sir William Johnson, however, complained in 1772 of robberies and murders committed by them through the intrigues and jealousy of the French traders. Their women were more reserved than was usual among Indians, and showed some tendency toward refinement in manners. The Potawatomi of Milwaukee r., who were considerably intermixed with Sauk and Winnebago, were described about 1825 as being lazy fellows, as a rule preferring to fish and hunt all summer long rather than to cultivate corn, and noted players of the moccasin game and lacrosse, heavy gamblers and given to debauchery. Polygamy was common among the Potawatomi when they were visited by the early missionaries.

According to Schoolcraft, it is believed by the Potawatomi that there are two spirits who govern the world: one is called Kitchemonedo, or the Great Spirit; the other Matchemonedo, or the Evil Spirit; the first is good and beneficent, the other wicked. But all this is the result of Christian teaching. In former times the Potawatomi worshiped the sun to some extent—at least they sometimes offered sacrifice in honor of the sun in order that the sick might recover or that some desire might be obtained. They were accustomed, as were several other tribes of the N. W., to hold what has been called the "feast of dreams," during which their special or individual manito was selected. Dog meat was the flesh chiefly used at this feast. Burial was probably chiefly by inhumation, though there is some evidence that scaffold exposure was practised by the western part of the tribe. Sir Daniel Wilson alludes to certain graves surmounted by small mounds, which the surveyors informed him were Potawatomi burial places. Other graves of the same character found in Iowa are also known to have been burial places of people of the same tribe. Cremation was sometimes resorted to, but this appears to have been limited exclusively to those belonging to the Rabbit gens. About the year 1825 many of them took up the doctrine of the Kickapoo prophet Kanakuk. The Potawatomi have a tendency to elide vowels and syllables, due to the rapidity with which the dialect is spoken as compared with that of the Ottawa and the Chippewa (W. Jones, inf'n, 1906).

Chauvignerie (1736) mentions among the Potawatomi totems the golden carp, frog, tortoise, crab, and crane. According to Morgan (Anc. Soc., 167, 1877) they have 15 gentes, as follows: (1) Moah, 'Wolf'; (2) Mko, 'Bear'; (3) Muk, 'Beaver'; (4) Misshawa, 'Elk'; (5) Maak, 'Loon'; (6) Knou, 'Eagle'; (7) Nma, 'Sturgeon'; (8) Nmapena, 'Carp'; (9) Mgezewa, 'Bald Eagle'; (10) Chekwa, 'Thunder'; (11) Wabozo, 'Rabbit'; (12) Kakagshe, 'Crow'; (13) Wakeshi, 'Fox'; (14) Penna, 'Turkey'; (15) Mketashshekakah, 'Black Hawk.'

The tribe probably never greatly exceeded 3,000 souls, and most estimates place them far below that number. The principal estimates give them about 1,500 in 1765, 1,750 in 1766, 2,250 in 1778, 2,000 in 1783, 1,200 in 1795, 2,500 in 1812, 3,400 in 1820, and 1,800 in 1843. The last estimate does not include those who had recently fled to Canada. In 1908 those in the United States were reported to number 2,522, distributed as follows: Citizen Potawatomi in Oklahoma, 1,768; Prairie band in Kansas, 676; and Potawatomi of Huron, in Calhoun co., Mich., 78. A few besides these are scattered through their ancient territory and at various other points. Those in British territory are all in the province of Ontario and number about 220, of whom 176 are living with Chippewa and Ottawa on Walpole id. in L. St Clair, and the remainder (no longer officially reported) are divided between Caradoc and Rivière aux Sables, where they reside by permission of the Chippewa and Munsee.

The Potawatomi have participated in the following treaties with the United States: Ft Harmar, Ohio, Jan. 9, 1789; Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795; Ft Wayne, Ind., June 7, 1803; Ft Industry, Ohio, July 4, 1805; Grouseland, Ind., Aug. 21, 1805; Detroit, Mich., Nov. 17, 1807; Brownstown, Mich., Nov. 25, 1808; Ft Wayne, Ind., Sept. 30, 1809; Greenville, Ohio, July 22, 1814; Portage des Sioux, Mo., July 18, 1815; Spring Wells, Mich., Sept. 8, 1815; St Louis, Mo., Aug. 24, 1816; Miami, Ohio, Sept. 29, 1817; St Mary's, Ohio, Oct. 2, 1818; Chicago, Ill., Aug. 29, 1821; Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825; Wabash, Ind., Oct. 16, 1826; St Joseph, Mich., Sept. 19, 1827; Green Bay, Wis., Aug. 25, 1828; St Joseph River, Mich., Sept. 20, 1828; Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 29, 1829; Camp Tippecanoe, Ind., Oct. 20, 1832; Tippecanoe River, Ind., Oct. 26 and 27, 1832; Chicago, Ill., Sept. 26, 1833; Lake Maxeeniekuekee, Ind., Dec. 4, 1834; Tippecanoe River, Ind., Dec. 10, 1834; Potawattimie Mills, Ind., Dec. 16, 1834; Logansport, Ind., Dec. 17, 1834; Turkey Creek Prairie, Ind., Mar. 26, 1836; Tippecanoe River, Ind., Mar. 29 and Apr. 11, 1836; Indian Agency, Ind., Apr. 22, 1836; Yellow River, Ind., Aug. 5, 1836; Chippewanaung, Ind., Sept. 20, 22, and 23, 1836; Washington, D. C., Feb. 11, 1837; Council Bluffs, Iowa, June 5 and 17, 1846; Kansas River, Kan., Nov. 15, 1861; Washington, D. C., Feb. 27, 1867.

The following were Potawatomi villages: Abercronk (?), Ashkum's Village, Assimnehkon, Aubbeenaubbee's Village, Chichawkose's Village, Chekase's Village, Chichipe Outipe, Chippoy, Comoza's Village, Kewigoshkeem's Village, Kinkash's Village, Little Rock, Macon, Macousin, Mangachqua, Maquanago (?), Masac's Village, Matchebenashshewish's Village, Maukekose's Village, Menominee's Village, Menoquet's Village, Mesheketeno's Village, Mesquawbuck's Village, Mickkesawbee, Milwaukee, Minemaung's Village, Mota's Village, Muskwawasepeotan, Natowasepe, Nayonsay's Village, Pierish's Village, Pokagon, Prairie Ronde, Rock Village, Rum's Village, St Joseph (mission), St Michael (mission), Sawmehnaug, Seginsavin's Village, Shaytee's Village, Shobonier's Village, Soldier's Village, Tassinong, Toisa's Village, Tonquish's Village, Topenebee's Village, Waisuskuck's Village, Wanatah, Wimego's Village, Winamac's Village, Wonongoseak. Potawatomi of Huron. A division of the Potawatomi, formerly living on Huron r., in s. e. Michigan. They participated in the treaty of Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795, and they are also specially mentioned in the treaty of Detroit, Nov. 17, 1807. Their number has been small from the time they first came into notice. The population given in 1871 is 50; in 1886, 79; in 1888, the last enumeration, 77. An itinerary of about 1770 (Mich. Pion. Coll., xiii, 49, 1889) says their village then consisted of six large cabins, and gives the distance from Detroit as 40 m. By 1886 these Potawatomi had all taken lands in severalty and had become citizens. When the Potawatomi ceded the greater portion of their lands to the United States and moved w. of the Mississippi, this band and some of the tribe living in Indiana refused to join in the movement and have remained on their early home lands. (C. T.)

Potawatomi of the Wabash. A group of Potawatomi bands having their villages on the headwaters of Tippecanoe r., Ind. By the treaty of Chippewaynaung (U. S. Ind. Treat., 713, 1873) they sold their reserves in 1836 and agreed to remove within two years across the Mississippi. They were the bands under the chiefs known as Ashkum, Chechawkose, Menoquet, Mota, Kinkash, Weesionas, and Wesaw.

Potic (probably an equivalent of Abnaki and Mohegan Powntuckúk, 'country about the falls'). A Mechkentowoon village w. of the present Athens, Greeneco., N. Y. It was temporarily occupied by the fugitive Pennacook after their flight from New England about 1676.

Potlapigua. Mentioned by Orozco y Berra (Geog., 58, 348, 1864) as a division of the Pima Alta, inhabiting the region about Bahispe, Baserac, and the frontier, in Sonora, Mexico. This was Opata territory. The name was also applied to their principal settlement.

Potlas (Pótlas). A gens of the Nuhalk people, a Bellacoola subdivision of the coast of British Columbia.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891.

Potlatch. The great winter ceremonials among the tribes of the n. Pacific coast from Oregon to Alaska. The word has passed into popular speech along the N. W. coast from the Chinook jargon, into which it was adopted from the Nootka word patshatl, 'giving,' or 'a gift.'

Although varying considerably in different parts of the coast, these potlatches were mainly marked, as the name implies, by the giving away of quantities of goods, commonly blankets. The giver sometimes went so far as to strip himself of nearly every possession except his house, but he obtained an abundant reward, in his own estimation, in the respect with which his fellow-townsmen afterward regarded him, and when others "potlatched" he, in turn, received a share of their property with interest, so that potentially he was richer than before. During the festival in which the gifts were made, houses and carved poles were raised, chiefs' children were initiated into the secret societies, their ears, noses, and lips were pierced for ornaments, and sales of copper plates, which figured prominently in the social and economic life of the people of this region, took place. Among the Haida, children were then tattooed. All was accompanied with dancing, singing, and feasting. Consult Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. for 1895. See Fasting, Feasts, Hospitality. (J. R. S.)

Potomac. An Indian town, the name of which, when heard by the discoverers and first explorers of the river, was supposed by them to be that of the stream, and was erroneously written Patowomek. This town was situated about 55 m. in a straight line from Chesapeake bay, on a peninsula, in what is now Stafford co., Va., formed by Potomac r. and Potomac cr. It was the principal residence of a werowance who is said to have been as powerful as Powhatan, but whose name has not been preserved. On his return from a visit to Powhatan's son, Parahunt ('One who misses his aim,' otherwise called Tanx Powhatan, or 'The lesser Powhatan'), this werowance was accompanied by Henry Spelman, once interpreter to the Jamestown colony, who took the occasion now offered him to escape from the bondage into which he had been sold to Parahunt by Capt. John Smith. Spelman, in his Relation of Virginia (ca. 1613), styles his new master "King Patomecke" and his people the "Patomeck."

The word Patomeck (Pütóměk) is a verbal noun meaning 'something brought,' and, as a designation for a place, may perhaps be short for, say, Enda Pütóměk, 'where something is brought.' Verbal nouns of this kind, for which one grammarian has proposed the name of "gerundives," are found only in the eastern Algonquian dialects. They are formed from both transitive and intransitive verbs by suffixing thereto, after a slight change in the termination, the syllable -mėk, -mük, or -mĩk, according to dialect. Thus, in Abnaki, from bägäsĩtun, 'he cooks it,' is formed bägäsĩtumėk, 'something cooked;' from tsükěśáwětun, 'he ignites with it,' tsükěśáwětumėk, 'with what is ignited' (a match.) In Natick, from womússu, 'he descends,' is formed womússimúk, 'a descent.' In Delaware, from wulāptoneu, 'he speaks favorably,' is formed wulāptonāmĩk, 'good tidings.' In like manner, from pāton, 'he brings it,' is formed pütóměk, 'what is brought.'

The town so called may have been the place to which the tribes along the river and in its vicinity brought the tribute which was expected from them by the werowance of the country. (W. R. G.).

Potomac. An important tribe of the Powhatan confederacy, formerly occupying the s. bank of Potomac r., in Stafford and King George cos., Va. In 1608 they numbered about 800. Their principal village bore the same name. The Conoy stated in 1660 that they were among those over whom the Potomac chief at one time had dominion (Maryland Archives, Proc. Council, 1636-67, 403, 1885).

Potopaco (Potōpākū, equivalent of Massachusetts potūpagw, Abnaki poděbāgw, 'bay,' 'cove'). A village on the left bank of Potomac r., in Charles co., Md., w. of Port Tobacco, the name of which is a corruption of the Indian word. About 1642 the Jesuit mission was removed to that place from Piscataway, and the village then contained 130 converts. It was extinct in 1722.

Potoyanti. A band, probably Moquelumnan, formerly living about the headwaters of Tuolumne, Merced, and Mariposa rs., central Cal. During the mission period they were neophytes of Dolores mission, and prior to 1851 were placed by United States authorities on a reserve between the Tuolumne and the Merced. There were 110 of them on Fresno reserve in 1861.

Potrero (a Spanish word with several meanings, here referring to pasture ground). A Luiseno village in San Diego co., s. Cal.; pop. 177 in 1865. The name was subsequently given to a reservation of 8,329.12 acres of allotted land, 75 m. from Mission Tule River agency, on which were situated the settlements of La Joya and La Piche, containing 225 people. In 1905 the Potrero res. was consolidated with that of Morongo, in Riverside co., Cal., under the San Jacinto superintendency.

Pottery. Many of the more cultured American tribes were skilful potters. The Peruvians are generally regarded as having taken the lead in this art, but the Colombians, Central Americans, and Mexicans were not far behind, and some excellent work was done also in Brazil and Argentina. Within the area of the United States the art had made very considerable advance in two culture centers—the Pueblo region of the S. W. and the great mound province of the Mississippi valley and the Gulf states. Over the remainder of North America, n. of Mexico, the potter's art was limited to the making of rude utensils or was practically unknown. The Pueblo tribes of New Mexico and Arizona, as well as some of the adjacent tribes to lesser extent, still practise the art in its aboriginal form, and the Cherokee and Catawba of North and South Carolina have not yet ceased to manufacture utensils of clay, although the shapes have been much modified by contact with the whites. The Choctaw of Mississippi and the Mandan of the middle Missouri valley have but recently abandoned the art.

It has been observed that pottery is not among the earlier arts practised by primitive peoples. With nomads it is not available because of the fragility of the utensils, but sedentary life encourages its development. Among the more primitive peoples stone-boiling in baskets and in bark and wooden vessels was and is practised, and even with some fully sedentary tribes, as those of the N. W. coast, these vessels have not yet been replaced by earthenware. The introduction or rise of the potter's art among primitive peoples is believed to correspond somewhat closely with the initial stages of barbarism; but this idea must be liberally interpreted, as some tribes well advanced toward higher barbarism are without it.

The clay used was mixed with various tempering ingredients, such as sand or pulverized stone, potsherds, and shells; the shapes were extremely varied and generally were worked out by the hand, aided by simple modeling tools. The building of the vessel, the principal product of the potter's art, varied with the different tribes. Usually a bit of the clay was shaped into a disk for the base, and the walls were carried up by adding strips of clay until the rim was reached.

When the strips were long they were carried around as a spiral coil. As the height increased the clay was allowed to set sufficiently to support the added weight. The Pueblo potters, to facilitate the work of modeling, sometimes placed the incipient vessel in a shallow basket, or upon the bottom fragment of an old vessel, or, as for example the Zuñi, upon a specially made dish. As a rule, the baking was done in open or smothered fires or in extremely crude furnaces, and the paste remained comparatively soft. In Central America a variety of ware was made with hard paste somewhat resembling our stoneware. Notwithstanding the remarkable aptness of the Americans in this art, and their great skill in modeling, they had not achieved the wheel, nor had they fully mastered the art of glazing.

ROULETTE USED IN DECORATING EARTHENWARE. (RESTORATION)

In New Mexico and Arizona a variety of pottery is found on deserted village sites showing rather crude decorative designs executed in a medium usually of brownish and greenish hues having the effect of a glaze, and while the nature of the mixture is not well known, chemical examination shows that in some cases at least this is a salt glaze. Women were the potters, and the product consisted mainly of vases for household use, although the most cultured tribes made and decorated vases for exclusively ceremonial purposes. In some communities a wide range of articles was made, the plastic nature of the material having led to the shaping of many fanciful forms. Florida burial mounds contain many rudely shaped vessels, often

The ornamentation of vases included the modeling of various life forms in the round and in relief, and incising, imprinting, and stamping designs of many kinds in the soft clay. The more advanced potters employed color in surface finish and in executing various designs. The designs were often geometric and primitive in type, but in many sections life forms were introduced in great variety and profusion, and these were no doubt often symbolic, having definite relation to the use of the object, ceremonial or otherwise. Unbroken examples of earthenware are preserved mainly through burial with the dead, and the numerous specimens in our collections were obtained mainly from burial places. On inhabited sites the vessels are usually broken, but even in this form they are of great value to the archeologist for the reason that they contain markings or other features peculiar to the tribes concerned in their manufacture.

toy-like, besides other articles of clay in great variety, manifestly intended as mortuary offerings and not to serve any practical end (Moore).

The ancient potters of the Pueblo country excelled those of the historic period in the quality and beauty of their ware, as in Tusayan, and some varieties are without a rival in the art of the valley of Mexico. We here recognize numerous groups of products representing different communities, tribes, or groups of tribes, but there is a general resemblance throughout in form, material, method of manufacture, and ornament. This is true of the pottery of the present tribes; the ware of the Zuni, for example, although having a family resemblance to the wares of the Hopi, the Acoma, the Sia, and the Cochiti, is readily distinguished from them. Apparently the most primitive pottery of the region is the coiled ware, which is built up of strips of clay so coiled and indented as to give the effect of basketry. This and the white ware with decorations in black lines and figures are apparently connected more especially with the cliff-dwelling period (see Cliff-dwellings). The beautiful polychrome vases of the ancient Hopi of Arizona are the most artistic of northern ceramic products. They are well illustrated by collections from the ancient sites of Homolobi, Sikyatki, and Shongopovi (Fewkes).

The tribes of the plains did not practice the art save in its simplest forms, but of life forms—men, beasts, birds, and fishes; and the grotesque was much affected. Aside from plastic embellishment, the vases were decorated in color, and more especially in incised and stamped designs, those on the Gulf coast presenting slight suggestions of the influence of the semi-civilized cultures of Yucatan, Mexico, and the West Indies.

The pottery of the tribes of the S. Atlantic states and Canada consists mainly of simple culinary utensils, mostly round or conical bodied bowls and pots decorated with angular incised lines and textile imprints. The best examples are recovered from burial places in central-southern New York and northern Pennsylvania—the region occupied from the earliest times by the Iroquois. The clay tobacco the ancient tribes of the middle and lower Mississippi valley and the Gulf states were excellent potters. The forms of the vessels and the styles of decoration are exceedingly varied, and indicate a remarkable predilection for the modeling fluenced to some extent by the presence of the whites (Holmes). The practical absence of pottery from the Pacific states and British Columbia is noteworthy. The few rude vessels found in central and southern California are believed to be of somewhat late origin, and may be due to the influence of the Pueblo tribes on the x. The principal earthen relics of well-determined antiquity are clay pellets, probably intended for use in slings, labret-like forms, beads, etc., obtained from mounds in the San Joaquin valley (Holmes). According to Culin, clay pellets are still used by the Pomo with the sling for hunting birds. The early and very general use of basketry and of stone vessels in this region may have operated to retard the development of the potter's art. N. of the Canadian boundary conditions were not favorable to the development of this art, although specimens of rude earthenware are obtained from mounds and other sites in New Brunswick (Matthew and Kain), the Lakes provinces (Boyle), the Red r. country (Montgomery), and in Alaska as far as Pt. Barrow (Murdoch).

Poweshiek (properly Pawshika, 'he who shakes [something] off [himself]', a masculine proper name in the Bear clan, the ruling clan of the Foxes). A Fox chief at the period of the Black Hawk war in 1832. It was he, rather than Keokuk, to whom was due the weakening of Black Hawk's fighting power. The tie which held together the Sauk and Foxes had for some time been growing weak, and when Kwaskwamia, a subordinate Sauk chief, ceded away the Rock River country in Illinois, without the knowledge or consent of the rest of the people, Poweshiek with most of the Foxes withdrew from the others and crossed the Mississippi to the vicinity of the present Davenport, Iowa. When the fighting began they were joined here by Keokuk and the fleeing Sauk, and later also by the defeated hostiles, to whom they gave protection. Poweshiek died in Kansas. In behalf of his tribe he signed the treaty of Ft. Armstrong, Rock Island, Ill., Sept. 21, 1832; treaties made in the same locality, Sept. 27 and 28, 1836; Washington, Oct. 21, 1837; and Sac and Fox agency, Iowa, Oct. 11, 1842. A county of Iowa takes its name from him. (W. J.)

Powhatan (Southern Renape pawā'tan, 'falls in a current' of water.—Gerard). A confederacy of Virginian Algonquian tribes. Their territory included the tide-water section of Virginia from the Potomac s. to the divide between James r. and Albemarle rd., and extended into the interior as far as the falls of the principal rivers about Fredericksburg and Richmond. They also occupied the Virginia counties e. of Chesapeake bay and possibly included some tribes in lower Maryland. In the piedmont region w. of them were the hostile Monacan and Manahoac, while on the s. were the Chowanoc, Nottoway, and Meherrin of Iroquoian stock. Although little is known in regard to the language of these tribes, it is believed they were more nearly related to the Delawares than to any of the northern or more westerly tribes, and were derived either from them or from the same stem. Brinton, in his tentative arrangement, placed them between the Delawares and Nanticoke on one side and the Pamptico on the other.

When first known the Powhatan had nearly 200 villages, more than 160 of which are named by Capt. John Smith on his map. The Powhatan tribes were visited by some of the earliest explorers of the period of the discovery, and in 1570 the Spaniards established among them a Jesuit mission, which had but a brief existence. Fifteen years later the southern tribes were brought to the notice of the English settlers at Roanoke id., but little was known of them until the establishment of the Jamestown settlement in 1607. The Indians were generally friendly until driven to hostility by the exactions of the whites, when petty warfare ensued until peace was brought about through the marriage of Powhatan's daughter to John Rolfe, an Englishman. (See Pocahontas). A few years later the Indians were thinned by pestilence, and in 1618 Powhatan died and left the government to Opechancanough. The confederacy seems to have been of recent origin at the period of Powhatan's succession, as it then included but 7 of the so-called tribes besides his own, all the others having been conquered by himself during his lifetime.

Opechancanough was the deadly foe of the whites, and at once began secret preparations for a general uprising. On Mar. 22, 1622, a simultaneous attack was made along the whole frontier, in which 347 of the English were killed in a few hours, and every settlement was destroyed excepting those immediately around Jamestown, where the whites had been warned in time. As soon as the English could recover from the first shock, a war of extermination was begun against the Indians. It was ordered that three expeditions should be undertaken yearly against them in order that they might have no chance to plant their corn or build their wigwams, and the commanders were forbidden to make peace upon any terms whatever. A large number of Indians were at one time induced to return to their homes by promises of peace, but all were massacred in their villages and their houses burned. The ruse was attempted a second time, but was unsuccessful. The war went on for 14 years, until both sides were exhausted, when peace was made in 1636. The greatest battle was fought in 1625 at Pamunkey, where Gov. Wyatt defeated nearly 1,000 Indians and burned their village, the principal one then existing.

Peace lasted until 1641, when the Indians were aroused by new encroachments of the whites, and Opechancanough, then an aged man, organized another general attack, which he led in person. In a single day 500 whites were killed, but after about a year the old chief was taken and shot. By his death the confederacy was broken up, and the tribes made separate treaties of peace and were put upon reservations, which were constantly reduced in size by sale or by confiscation upon slight pretense. About 1656 the Cherokee from the mountains invaded the lowlands. The Pamunkey chief with 100 of his men joined the whites in resisting the invasion, but they were almost all killed in a desperate battle on Shocco cr., Richmond. In 1669 a census of the Powhatan tribes showed 528 warriors, or about 2,100 souls, still surviving, the Wicocomoco being then the largest tribe, with 70 warriors, while the Pamunkey had become reduced to 50.

In 1675 some Conestoga, driven by the Iroquois from their country on the Susquehanna, entered Virginia and committed depredations. The Virginian tribes were accused of these acts, and several unauthorized expeditions were led against them by Nathaniel Bacon, a number of Indians being killed and villages destroyed. The Indians at last gathered in a fort near Richmond and made preparations for defense. In Aug., 1676, the fort was stormed, and men, women, and children were massacred by the whites. The adjacent stream was afterward known as Bloody run from this circumstance. The scattered survivors asked peace, which was granted on condition of an annual tribute from each village. In 1722 a treaty was made at Albany by which the Iroquois agreed to cease their attacks upon the Powhatan tribes, who were represented at the conference by four chiefs. Iroquois hostility antedated the settlement of Virginia. With the treaty of Albany the history of the Powhatan tribes practically ceased, and the remnants of the confederacy dwindled silently to final extinction. About 1705 Beverley had described them as "almost wasted." They then had 12 villages, 8 of which were on the Eastern shore, the only one of consequence being Pamunkey, with about 150 souls. Those on the Eastern shore remained until 1831, when the few surviving individuals, having become so much mixed with negro blood as to be hardly distinguishable, were driven off during the excitement caused by the slave rising under Nat Turner. Some of them had previously joined the Nanticoke. Jefferson's statement, in his Notes on Virginia, regarding the number and condition of the Powhatan remnant in 1785, are very misleading. He represents them as reduced to the Pamunkey and Mattaponi, making altogether only about 15 men, much mixed with negro blood, and only a few of the older ones preserving the language. The fact is that the descendants of the old confederacy must then have numbered not far from 1,000, in several tribal bands, with a considerable percentage still speaking the language. They now number altogether about 700, including the Chickahominy, Nandsemond, Pamunkey, and Mattaponi (q. v.), with several smaller bands. Henry Spelman, who was prisoner among the Powhatan for some time, now in the house of one chief and then in that of another, mentions several interesting customs. The priests, he says, shaved the right side of the head, leaving a little lock at the ear, and some of them had beards. The common people pulled out the hairs of the beard as fast as they grew. They kept the hair on the right side of the head cut short, "that it might not hinder them by flapping about their bowstring when they draw it to shoot; but on ye other side they let it grow and haue a long locke hanging doune ther shoulder." Tattooing was practised to some extent, especially by the women. Among the better sort it was the custom, when eating, for the men to sit on mats round about the house, to each of whom the women brought a dish, as they did not eat together out of one dish. Their marriage customs were similar to those among other Indian tribes, but, according to Spelman, "ye man goes not unto any place to be married, but ye woman is brought unto him wher he dwelleth." If the presents of a young warrior were accepted by his mistress, she was considered as having agreed to become his wife, and, without any further explanation to her family, went to his hut, which became her home, and the ceremony was ended. Polygamy, Spelman asserts, was the custom of the country, depending upon the ability to purchase wives; Burk says, however, that they generally had but one wife. Their burial customs varied according to locality and the dignity of the person. The bodies of their chiefs were placed on scaffolds, the flesh being first removed from the bones and dried, then wrapped with the bones in a mat, and the remains were then laid in their order with those of others who had previously died. For their ordinary burials they dug deep holes in the earth with very sharp stakes, and, wrapping the corpse in the skins, laid it upon sticks in the ground and covered it with earth.

They believed in a multitude of minor deities, paying a kind of worship to everything that was able to do them harm beyond their prevention, such as fire, water, lightning, and thunder, etc. They also had a kind of chief deity variously termed Okee, Quioccos, or Kiwasa, of whom they made images, which were usually placed in their burial temples. They believed in immortality, but the special abode of the spirits does not appear to have been well defined. The office of werowance, or chieftaincy, appears to have been hereditary through the female line, passing first to the brothers, if there were any, and then to the male descendants of sisters, but never in the male line. The Chickahominy, it is said, had no such custom nor any regular chief, the priests and leading men ruling, except in war, when the warriors selected a leader.

According to Smith, "their houses are built like our arbors, of small young sprigs, bowed and tied, and so close covered with mats or the bark of trees very handsomely, that notwithstanding wind, rain, or weather they are as warm as stoves, but very smoky, yet at the top of the house there is a hole made for the smoke to go into right over the fire." According to White's pictures they were oblong, with a rounded roof (see Habitations). They varied in length from 12 to 24 yds., and some were as much as 36 yds. long, though not of great width. They were formed of poles or saplings fixed in the ground at regular intervals, which were bent over from the sides so as to form an arch at the top. Pieces running horizontally were fastened with withes, to serve as braces and as supports for bark, mats, or other coverings. Many of their towns were inclosed with palisades, consisting of posts planted in the ground and standing 10 or 12 ft high. The gate was usually an overlapping gap in the circuit of palisades. Where great strength and security were required, a triple stockade was sometimes made. These inclosing walls sometimes encompassed the whole town; in other cases only the chief's house, the burial house, and the more important dwellings were thus surrounded. They appear to have made considerable advance in agriculture, cultivating 2 or 3 varieties of maize, beans, certain kinds of melons or pumpkins, several varieties of roots, and even 2 or 3 kinds of fruit trees.

They computed by the decimal system. Their years were reckoned by winters, cohonks, as they called them, in imitation of the note of the wild geese, which came to them every winter. They divided the year into five seasons, viz, the budding or blossoming of spring; earing of corn, or roasting-ear time; the summer, or highest sun; the corn harvest, or fall of the leaf, and the winter, or cohonk. Months were counted as moons, without relation to the number in a year; but they arranged them so that they returned under the same names, as the moon of stags, the corn moon, first and second moon of cohonks (geese), etc. They divided the day into three parts, "the rise, power, and lowering of the sun." They kept their accounts by knots on strings or by notches on a stick.

The estimate of population given by Smith is 2,400 warriors. Jefferson, on the basis of this, made their total population about 8,000.

The tribes, in the order of their location on Smith's map, were as follows: Tauxenent, Fairfax co.; Potomac, Stafford and King (George cos.); Cuttatawomen, King (George co.); Pissasec, King (George and Richmond cos.); Onawmanient, Westmoreland co.; Rappahannock, Richmond co.; Moraughtacund, Lancaster and Richmond cos.; Secacawoni, Northumberland co.; Wicocomoco, Northumberland co.; Nantaughtacund, Essex and Caroline cos.; Mattapony, Mattapony r.; Mummupacune, York r. (mentioned by Strachey); Pamunkey, King William co.; Werowocomoco, Gloucester co.; Piankatank, Piankatank r.; Pataunck (mentioned by Strachey) and Youghtanund, Pamunkey r.; Chickahominy, Chickahominy r.; Powhatan, Henrico co.; Arrohattoc, Henrico co.; Weanoc, Charles City co.; Paspahagh, Charles City and James City cos.; Chiskiac, York co.; Kecoughtan, Elizabeth City co.; Appomattoc, Chesterfield co.; Quioucohanoc, Surry co.; Warrasqueoc, Isle of Wight co.; Nansemond, Nansemond co.; Chesapeake, Princess Anne co.; Accohanoc, Accomac and Northampton cos.; Accomac, Northampton co. Several other names appear in later times as the broken tribes formed new combinations.

The following were Powhatan villages: Accohanoc, Accomac, Aconoc, Accoqueck, Accossuwinck, Acquack, Anaske-noans, Appocant, Appomattoc, Arrohattoc, Askakep, Assaomeck, Assuweska, Attamtuck, Aubomesk, Aureuapeugh, Cantaunkack, Capahowasic, Cattachiptico, Cawwontoll, Chawopo, Checopissow, Chesakawon, Chesapeak, Chiconessex, Chincoteague, Chiskiac, Cinquack, Cinquoteck, Cuttatawomen (1), Cuttatawomen (2), Gangasco, Kapawnich, Kerahocak, Kiequotank, Kupkipcock, Machapunga (1), Machapunga (2), Mamanahunt, Mamanassy, Mangoraca, Mantoughquemec, Martoughquaunk, Massawoteck, Matchopick, Matchut, Mathomauk, Matomkin, Mattacock, Mattacunt, Mattanock, Maysonec, Menapucunt, Menaskunt, Meyascosic, Mohominge, Mokete, Moraughtacund, Mouanast, Mutchut, Muttamussinsack, Myghtuckpassu, Namassingakent, Nameroughquena, Nansemond, Nantapoyac, Nantaughtacund, Nawacaten, Nawnautough, Nechanicok, Nepawtacum, Onancock, Onawmanient, Powhatan. The ruling chief and practically the founder of the Powhatan confederacy (q. v.) in Virginia at the period of the first English settlement. His proper name was Wahunsonacock, but he was commonly known as Powhatan from one of his favorite residences at the falls of James r. (Richmond). According to Smith, of some 30 cognate tribes subject to his rule in 1607, all but six were his own conquests. At the time of the coming of the English, Powhatan is represented to have been about 60 years of age, of dignified bearing, and reserved and stern disposition. His first attitude toward the whites was friendly although suspicious, but he soon became embittered by the exactions of the newcomers. On the treacherous seizure of his favorite daughter, Pocahontas (q. v.), in 1613, he became openly hostile, but was happily converted for the time through her marriage to Rolfe. He died in 1618, leaving the succession to his brother, Opitchapan, who however was soon superseded by a younger brother, the noted Opechancanough (q. v.). (J. M.)

Powhatan. The tribe which gave name to the Powhatan confederacy. Its territory was in what is now Henrico co., Va., and the tribe numbered about 150 in 1608. The chief of the tribe at the time the English commenced the settlement at Jamestown was called Wahunsonacock, but was commonly known to the whites as Powhatan from his place of residence, and the name was extended to the confederacy. (J. M.)

Powhatan. The village of the Powhatan tribe, situated on the n. bank of James r., Va., at the falls, on ground now forming an eastern suburb of the city of Richmond.

Powitch. A western name of the Oregon crab-apple (Pyrus rivularis), known also as powitch-tree, from pówitsh, the Chinook name of this plant, through the Chinook jargon. (A. F. C.)

Powow. A term to which is now assigned the following meanings: 1. A medicine-man. 2. The conjuring of a medicine-man over a patient. 3. A dance, feast, or noisy celebration preceding a council, expedition, or hunt. 4. A council. 5. A conference. The most recent use by the whites is in the sense of a political conference or talk. It is now used both as a noun and as a verb. In Narraganset powáw and in Massachuset pauwau, cognate with the Micmac bú'utn, signifies priest, wizard, magician. As Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 488, 1877) remarks, "the name was also given by the early chronicles to the feasts, dances, and other public doings of the red men, preliminary to a grand hunt, a war expedition, or the like," and was soon adopted by the whites "in political talk, to signify any uproarious meeting, etc." In certain parts of the Southern states the terms "powow doctor," and "to powow," meaning to practise witchcraft, are still in use. Brinton (Lenape Leg., 71, 1885) correctly considers this Algonquian word to be from the same root as Chippewa bawd-na, 'he dreams of him,' and the Cree páwámiw 'he dreams,' the powow obtaining his art from dreams. The Massachuset pauwau, 'he uses divination,' would then mean, more primitively, 'he dreams.' (A. F. C.)

Poykemkack. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the n. bank of the Rappahannock, in Richmond co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Prairie Band of Potawatomi. The division of the Potawatomi formerly residing s. of L. Michigan, in Wisconsin, Illinois, and Indiana. They adhered more closely to their old ways than the bands of the Wabash, the St Joseph, and Huron. Some authors have supposed them to be the old Mascoutens. The majority of them, numbering 676 in 1908, are now in Kansas, but a large number are still scattered over s. Wisconsin. See Potawatomi.

Prayer. In their endeavors to secure the help of the supernatural powers, the Indians, as well as other peoples, hold principally three methods: (1) The powers may be coerced by the strength of a ritualistic performance; (2) their help may be purchased by gifts in the form of sacrifices and offerings; or (3) they may be approached by prayer. Frequently the coercing ritualistic performance and the sacrifice are accompanied by prayers; or the prayer itself may take a ritualistic form, and thus attain coercive power. In this case the prayer is called an incantation. Prayers may either be spoken words, or they may be expressed by symbolic objects, which are placed so that they convey the wishes of the worshipper to the powers. The rituals of the Plains tribes and those of the Pueblos contain many prayers. Thus in the Hako ceremony of the Pawnee occurs a prayer-song in which the father of the powers is invoked to send needed help; in the Sun dance (q. v.) of the Arapaho occur prayers to the "Man-Above" for assistance in the performance of the ceremony; the Zúñi ceremonials contain prayers for rain, food, and health; the Hupa of California offer a prayer accompanying their ceremonials asking for health. Prayers accompanying rituals are rather rare on the N. Pacific coast. Very often prayers accompany sacrifices. They are given when tobacco smoke is offered to the gods; they accompanied bloody sacrifices of the Pawnee and the Iroquois, as well as the sacrifices of pollen among the Navaho. Prayers of this kind very commonly accompany the sacrifice of food to the souls of the deceased, as among the Algonquian tribes, Eskimo, and N.W. coast Indians. The custom of expressing prayers by means of symbolic objects is found principally among the Southwestern tribes (see Prayer sticks). Prayers are often preceded by ceremonial purification, fasting, the use of emetics and purgatives, which are intended to make the person praying agreeable to the powers. Among the North American Indians the prayer cannot be considered as necessarily connected with sacrifice or as a substitute for sacrifice, since in a great many cases prayers for good luck, for success, for protection, or for the blessing of the powers, are offered quite independently of the idea of sacrifice. While naturally material benefits are the object of prayer in by far the majority of cases, prayers for an abstract blessing and for ideal objects are not by any means absent. Among the northern Californian tribes and among the Eskimo the prayer is often pronounced in a set form, the effectiveness of which is not due to the willingness of the supernatural powers to take pity on the mortal, but to the set form in which the prayer is delivered, the prayer formula or the incantation being a charm by means of which the fulfillment of the prayer can be secured. The incantation may be effective through its power to coerce the supernatural powers to comply with the wish of the person praying, or it may act as a charm which gives fulfillment by its own inherent power. The Indians pray not only to those supernatural powers which are considered the protectors of man—like the personal guardians or the powers of nature—but also to the hostile powers that must be appeased. See Ceremonies, Mythology, Religion, Sacrifice. (F. B.)

Prayer sticks. Sticks to which feathers are attached, used as ceremonial supplicatory offerings. The most familiar prayer sticks are those made by the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico and Arizona, who use them extensively for a definite purpose, but analogous objects representing the same idea are employed in the ceremonies of nearly all American tribes. A great variety of prayer sticks of different sizes are employed by the Pueblos, though perhaps the greatest number measure the length of the hand with fingers extended, differing in form, number, painting, and carving, and having different kinds of feathers and objects attached to them, according to their destination and the person or persons offering them.

The making of prayer sticks among the Pueblos is a complicated ceremony, having a multitude of minute details to be observed. Cord of native cotton is used to attach the feathers, herbs, meal, etc., to the sticks, which, as a rule, are made of cottonwood shoots. The feathers are those of particular birds, and they must be perfect and come from particular parts of the plumage. The paints used must be ceremonially gathered, prepared, and applied. In paho-making even the refuse—chips of wood, ends of cord, etc.—is disposed of in a prescribed manner. Prayer sticks are often consecrated by being moistened with medicine, sprinkled with sacred meal, and fumigated with tobacco, and by other rites; and after prayers have been breathed into them they are sent out in the hands of messengers to be deposited in shrines, springs, or fields. Prayer sticks for family offerings are made on the occasion of ceremonies and are deposited also by authorized persons. Individual offerings of prayer sticks are also made.

The sticks to which the plumes are attached indicate the gods to whom the prayers are offered, and the feathers convey to the gods the prayers which are breathed into the spiritual essence of the plumes. This conception is materialized in the "breath feather," generally the downy plume of the eagle. Prayers are also breathed into sacred meal, pollen, and other objects offered.

The idea of feeding the gods is expressed by one form of the Hopi prayer stick, the páho, 'water prayer,' to which a small packet of sacred meal is tied. The prayer stick may be regarded as a symbolic substitute for human sacrifice (Fewkes in 16th Rep. B. A. E., 297, 1897). Prayer sticks, nearly always painted green or blue, are frequently found with the dead in ancient Pueblo cemeteries, and great deposits of them occur in ceremonial caves in s. Arizona. Navaho and Apache prayer sticks are similar to those of the Pueblos. The ornamented wands placed in the sod of the Pawnee Hako altar, and the feathered wands planted round the skull of the buffalo in the Cheyenne sun dance are examples of prayer sticks, and the Eskimo make use of similar wands. The so-called prayer stick of the Kickapoo was a mnemonic device for Christian prayer.

Praying Indians. Indians of different tribes who accepted the teachings of the missionaries, Catholic Iroquois, Moravian Indians, and, more especially, those Indians of E. Massachusetts and the adjacent region who were organized into Christian congregations by John Eliot and his successors. The missionary work was begun by Eliot in 1646 at Nonantum, a small village a few miles from Boston. His efforts were so successful that he soon had a considerable number of converts, who removed in 1650-51 to Natick, where a tract was reserved for them, and a new town was established under English regulations. These converts were some of the remnants of the Massachuset. The powerful tribes of the Wampanoag, Narraganset, and especially the Mohegan opposed the work and generally refused to allow the missionaries within their territories. The work went on rapidly along the E. coast and on the islands. In a few years the greater part of the natives of Marthas Vineyard and Nantucket were classed as Christians, while there were also numerous congregations on the peninsula E. of Buzzards bay and others in the interior farther N. In 1674, just before the outbreak of King Philip's war, there were in E. Massachusetts, excluding the peninsula, 7 principal praying towns: Hassanamesit, Magunkaquog, Nashobah, Natick, Okommakamesit, Punkapog, and Wamesit. There were also 7 new praying towns in the Nipmuc country, whose inhabitants had more recently been brought under missionary influence: Chabanakongkomun, Manchaug, Manexit, Wacuntug, Pakachoog, Quantisset, and Wabaquasset. The last three were in N. E. Connecticut. Wamesit, and perhaps Nashobah, were within the territory of the Pennacook, the others being occupied by the Massachuset and Nipmuc. The 14 villages numbered about 1,100 souls. Around Plymouth and on C. Cod were about 500 more, distributed among 23 villages. Those in Nantucket and Marthas Vineyard numbered perhaps 1,000 more, and there were a few others among the Mohegan. The entire number of professed Christian Indians in S. New England at the outbreak of King Philip's war was thus about 2,500. When the general Indian rising occurred in 1675, the Praying Indians found themselves in danger from both sides. The hostiles viewed them as traitors and renegades, while the whites despised them for their apparent weakness and suspected them to be secret allies of the enemy. The contemptuous treatment and harsh dealing of the English had already rendered the converts restive, and the result was that a great part of them joined the enemy, the inhabitants of several villages going off in a body. The others offered their services to the English, who accepted the help of a few, but had those remaining in the 7 original praying towns removed to an island in Boston harbor until the war was ended. These were soon reduced to 300 souls by starvation and exposure. The war practically ended the mission work. In 1682 only 4 of the 14 first-named praying towns remained, and only about 300 of their 1,100 inhabitants. The Indians E. of Buzzards bay also suffered, though in a less degree, but from their isolated position had generally remained quiet. Those on Marthas Vineyard and Nantucket refrained from hostilities, mainly on account of their affection for the missionary, Mayhew. After the dispersion or destruction of the more powerful tribes through this war, the remaining Indians ceased to be of importance, and the term "Praying Indians" lost its distinctive meaning. (J. Preservation of Collections. Fur, skin, feathers, woolen fabrics, and other organic materials subject to attack by insects enter so largely into ethnological collections that much attention is given to their preservation. Specimens are first subjected to the vapor of gasoline in an air-tight receptacle, where they may remain for several hours, after which they are removed and aired. Gasoline used freely will not injure specimens, and is efficient in destroying the eggs, larvæ, and adults of all insects, as well as molds and other low forms of life. The second step is dampening the sterilized specimens with a solution of corrosive sublimate, made by dissolving one-fourth ounce of bichloride of mercury in a pint of alcohol and adding a pint of soft water. A brush is used to apply the solution, which is used sparingly on colors that will "run." Some specimens may be dipped in the solution, but delicate articles are sprayed by means of an atomizer. Experience and judgment are necessary in the use of the poisonous and explosive preservatives. Before specimens having feathers, fur, or the like become quite dry they are brushed, rubbed, and shaken to restore them to their former condition. Specimens that have been poisoned are kept under observation for some time in order to ascertain the thoroughness of the treatment, which sometimes must be repeated. Gnawing insects are quickly detected by the droppings which fall from the specimens attacked. In the spring, cases are tested by the introduction of a little formaldehyde, which drives the insects from their hiding places. Specimens in which organic material is used for mounting or hafting receive careful attention to insure the thorough penetration of the poison to every part of the joints or interstices. Fur skins retaining animal oils are cleaned and made pliable by a taxidermist, who macerates them in a solution of equal parts of saltpeter, alum, borax, and Glauber's salt in water (2 oz. of each to the gallon) for 2 weeks, stirring once in a while. When removed, the skins are washed and worked till dry. Furriers steep and scour pelts in a bath of alum, bran, and salt to remove grease from the skin, and then in a bath of soap and soda to remove oil from the fur. By this process the skin is tanned.

The most difficult pests to eradicate are the wood-boring insects, which prey upon baskets, sapwood, and wood containing fecula. For plain wooden articles baking is necessary, followed by treatment with corrosive sublimate, as described above. In some museums specimens are subjected to dry heat in a sterilizing oven. The dangers of gasoline are thus avoided. But all specimens can not be treated by heat, and when specimens are placed in the oven in masses the heat does not sufficiently penetrate the interior to kill germs. Baskets, if soiled from use, may be scoured with a stiff brush and soap and water previous to fumigation and poisoning. They may also, when dry, be rubbed with a preparation made by dissolving an ounce of paraffin in a pint of turpentine and adding a little drying oil. This gives a slight gloss to the surface, brings out the design, and repels insects. It will also preserve, to some extent, unglazed pottery from dust and the effects of dampness, which sometimes, especially in mortuary pottery, cause exfoliation and the ultimate destruction of the vessels. In more serious cases vessels may be submerged in gasoline containing 6 oz. of paraffin to the gallon. Samples of foodstuffs and food preparations are placed in glass jars, a little gasoline is poured into each, and the jars are tightly closed. Moth balls may subsequently be placed in the jars. Moth balls of crude naphthol may be laid among specimens, some of which may have spots to which the poison has not adhered. Except in nearly air-tight spaces, however, moth balls do not protect unpoisoned articles from attacks of insects, while camphor, tobacco, pepper, and essential oils are practically valueless. It is found of advantage to brush the interior of drawers where specimens are stored with corrosive sublimate solution to prevent the harboring of insects in the corners and crevices, where they commonly undergo metamorphosis. Flags or other textiles of historic or ethnologic value which are fragile may be preserved by dampening them with a weak solution of alum and gum arabic in water. The alum preserves the colors and the gum arabic gives strength. Such specimens should be draped on wire netting or some other suitable support. Specimens of animal or vegetal origin must generally be poisoned to prevent the attacks of insects, placed in dust-proof cases, kept dry, and in some instances guarded against direct sunlight or strong reflected light, and against extremes of heat and cold.

Spears, swords, and other objects of iron are oiled with kerosene to soften rust, which then easily yields to gentle scraping with a knife blade. This is followed by a rubbing with emery cloth until the metal is clean, since the discolored layer beneath is the seat of continued oxidation. When clean, the metal is coated with the turpentine-paraffin solution and lightly wiped. Objects eaten by rust are warmed and dipped in the solution. If the objects are thin and fragile, they must be handled with care until the solution dries. The same treatment is given to exfoliating or verdigrised bronzes. Ancient pottery having incrustations on the exterior and chemical infiltrations is dipped in a 1-to-5 mixture of commercial muriatic acid in water, washed for 2 hours in plenty of pure water, and dried.

Among numerous materials used for repairing, cements and glues are important. For wooden articles a mixture of equal parts of white and brown glue, applied hot, suffices, or some of the trade liquid glues may be used. Plaster casts are mended with shellac dissolved in alcohol. Objects of stone, bone, shell, glass, porcelain, earthenware, etc., are preferably mended with casein cement.

Problematical Objects. There are several groups or classes of prehistoric art objects, mainly of stone, many of them of wide distribution, the purpose and significance of which are not fully determined. The possible uses, however, have been much discussed, and in a few cases the solution has become so nearly complete that the groups have been withdrawn from the problematical class. In archeological literature some of these groups of objects are referred to as "ceremonials," but, besides having a distinct and well-established application, this term is inappropriate, since there is no absolute assurance that the objects were used ceremonially. At the same time there is a strong probability that many of them had such use as a primary or a secondary function. It is equally clear that some of them served practical purposes. These groups of objects have been variously named from their form or supposed use, but in the absence of definite knowledge respecting their use or purpose it seems better, so far as possible, to assign names suggested by form only, as these are not seriously misleading and serve the purposes of classification and description. As our knowledge increases and uses become known, appropriate names will readily be suggested.

The names employed for the more fully segregated groups, most of which are already in use, are Banner stones, Bird-stones, Boat-stones, Cache disks and blades, Cones, Cupstones, Discoidal stones (chunkey stones?), Footprint sculptures, Hook-stones, Hemispheres, Inscribed tablets, Notched plates, Duck tablets, Pierced tablets (gorgets?), Plum-nets, Pulley-stones (ear ornaments?), Perforated stones (digging weights?), Spade-stones (ceremonial axes?), Spineback stones, Spools, Tubes (cupping tubes?). See the articles under these heads respectively. The hyphen used in this list indicates the omission of the word "shaped."

To this list could be added numerous less fully differentiated groups of objects in chipped and polished stone, in clay, bone, shell, wood, and metal, the significance and use of which can as yet only be surmised. Some of these are of formal and others of eccentric shape, while many represent men, beasts, and monsters; in fact, nearly all classes of prehistoric sculptured life forms could be assigned to the problematical class, since the motives which led to their manufacture, the particular significance attached to them, and the manner of their use, are and must remain largely subjects of conjecture. It is also true that many of the things of common use, as ornaments, implements, and pipes, have had associated with them ideas of a mystic nature known only to the individual or to the social or religious group to which they pertained. As already stated, some of the objects included in the list given above probably served practical uses, but objects designed for a definite practical use are necessarily measurably uniform in pattern and size, while many of the groups of objects under discussion show almost limitless variation as if subject to the free play of fancy, untrammelled save by those nebulous or plastic ideas that cluster about a primitive symbol of general use. It would appear also that some specimens were employed on occasion in practical work for which they were not originally intended, while others had their origin in implements of utility and probably retained in part their original functions; but in the majority of instances they doubtless had definite, well-established functions or purposes, the history of which is connected with the history of native religious beliefs and practices. The majority, however, can be interpreted, in a general way, through knowledge of the employment by historic tribes of similar classes of objects, variously referred to as amulets, charms, divinatory and gaming devices, emblems, fetishes, insignia, luck stones, medicine stones, symbols, talismans, tutelaries, etc. This affords but little aid, however, since full and clear explanations regarding the ceremonial and sacred objects of living peoples are difficult to obtain, if obtainable at all. This is exemplified by objects of such widespread use as the calumet, in very general use among the eastern tribes in colonial days, and the mysterious "coppers" of the

N. W. coast tribes, many of which have been handed down for generations and appear to be but imperfectly understood even by their present owners.

It may be observed, however, that none of these groups of objects can owe their origin to the play of fancy merely, for individual selections of talismans and tutelary deities are made at random and do not constitute or develop into groups of objects of well-established and widespread types with numerous variants. Such established types must be the outgrowth of customs of wide extent and affecting a large body of people. That some of the classes of objects devoted to esoteric uses had their origin in common implements, as axes, clubs, sinkers, mortars, pestles, etc., is highly probable, and it is equally likely that some of them had not been divorced wholly from their original application. Such transfers from practical to symbolic use are common with primitive peoples, the process being an easy and a natural one. It is not unlikely, therefore, that some of these classes of objects, exhibiting marked diversity of form, size, and finish, had multiple offices, serving on occasion or with different communities as implements, ornaments, and symbols. It may fairly be assumed, also, that such of these objects as embody conventional life forms had their origin in some animal fetish, totem, or other form of mythological symbol.

Most of the objects here referred to have been described and discussed by various writers, especially in archeological and other scientific journals, as the American Anthropologist, American Antiquarian, Antiquarian, Archæologist, Wisconsin Archeologist, Science, American Naturalist, etc.; in publications of institutions, societies, and the Government, as reports of the Smithsonian Institution, National Museum, Bureau of American Ethnology, Geographical and Geological Surveys, American Museum of Natural History, Peabody Museum of Archeology and Ethnology, Free Museum of Science and Art of the University of Pennsylvania, New York State Museum, Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, American Ethnological Society, Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, Canadian Institute, Education Department of Ontario, etc.; and in various works most of which are referred to in the articles treating of the individual varieties of problematical objects. Prominent among the latter are Abbott, Prim. Indus., 1881; Ann. Archæol. Reps. Ontario, 1888-1907; Brown in Wis. Archeol., II, no. 1, 1902; Clark, Prehist. Remains, 1876; Foster, *Prehist. Property and Property right. Broadly speaking, Indian property was personal. Clothing was owned by the wearer, whether man, woman, or child. Weapons and ceremonial paraphernalia belonged to the man; the implements used in cultivating the soil, in preparing food, dressing skins, and making garments and tent covers, and among the Eskimo the lamp, belonged to the women. In many tribes all raw materials, as meat, corn, and, before the advent of traders, pelts, were also her property. Among the tribes of the plains the lodge or tipi was the woman's, but on the N. W. coast the wooden structures belonged to the men of the family. Communal dwellings were the property of the kinship group, but individual houses were built and owned by the woman. While the land claimed by a tribe, often covering a wide area, was common to all its members and the entire territory was defended against intruders, yet individual occupancy of garden patches was respected. (See Land tenure.) In some instances, as among the Navaho, a section of territory was parceled out and held as clan land, and, as descent in the tribe was traced through the mother, this land was spoken of by members of the clan as "my mother's land." Upon such tract the women worked, raising maize, etc., and the product was recognized as their property. The right of a family to gather spontaneous growth from a certain locality was recognized, and the harvest became the personal property of the gatherers. For instance, among the Menominee a family would mark off a section by twisting in a peculiar knot the stalks of wild rice growing along the edge of the section chosen; this knotted mark would be respected by all members of the tribe, and the family could take its own time for gathering the crop. On the Pacific slope, as among the Hupa, varying lengths of river shore were held as private fishing rights by heads of families, and these rights passed from father to son, and were always respected. Clan rights to springs and tracts of land obtained among the Pueblos. The nests of eagles were also the property of the clan within whose domain they were found. The eagle never permanently left the vicinity of the nest where it was born, so, although the bird remained in freedom, it was regarded as the property of the clan claiming the land on which its nest was situated. This claim upon the eagles held good after the clan had left the region and built a new village even 40 m. away. (See Eagle.)

Names (q. v.) were sometimes the property of clans. Those bestowed on the individual members, and, as on the N. W. coast, those given to canoes and to houses, were owned by "families." Property marks were placed upon weapons and implements by the Eskimo and by the Indian tribes. A hunter established his claim to an animal by his personal mark upon the arrow which inflicted the fatal wound. Among both the Indians and the Eskimo it was customary to bury with the dead those articles which were the personal property of the deceased, either man or woman. In some of the tribes the distribution of all the property of the dead, including the dwelling, formed part of the funeral ceremonies. There was another class of property, composed of arts, trades, cults, rituals, and ritual songs, in which ownership was as well defined as in the more material things. For instance, the right to practise tattooing belonged to certain men in the tribe; the right to say or sing rituals and ritual songs had to be purchased from their owner or keeper. Occasionally a spectator with quick memory might catch a ritual or a song, but he would not dare to repeat what he remembered until he had properly paid for it. The shrine and sacred articles of the clan were usually in charge of hereditary keepers, and were the property of the clan. The peculiar articles of a society were in the custody of an appointed officer; they were property, but could not be sold or transferred. Songs and rites pertaining to the use of healing herbs were property, and their owner could teach them to another on receiving the prescribed payment. The accumulation of property in robes, garments, regalia, vessels, utensils, ponies, and the like, was important to one who aimed at leadership. To acquire property a man must be a skilful hunter and an industrious worker, and must have an able following of relatives, men and women, to make the required articles. All ceremonies, tribal festivities, public functions, and entertainment of visitors necessitated large contributions of food and gifts, and the men who could meet these demands became the recipients of tribal honors. (See Pollatch.)

Property right in harvest fields obtained among the tribes subsisting mainly on maize or on wild rice. Among the Chippewa the right in wild-rice lands was not based on tribal allotment, but on occupancy. Certain harvest fields were habitually visited by families that eventually took up their temporary or permanent abode at or near the fields; no one disputed their ownership, unless an enemy from another tribe, in which case might established right. Among the Potawatomi, according to Jenks, the people "always divide everything when want comes to the door."

Prophets. From time to time in every great tribe and every important crisis of Indian history we find certain men rising above the position of ordinary doctor, soothsayer, or ritual priest to take upon themselves an apostleship of reform and return to the uncorrupted ancestral belief and custom as the necessary means to save their people from impending destruction by decay or conquest. In some cases the teaching takes the form of a new Indian gospel, the revolutionary culmination of a long and silent development of the native religious thought. As the faithful disciples were usually promised the return of the earlier and happier conditions, the restoration of the diminished game, the expulsion of the alien intruder, and reunion in earthly existence with the priests who had preceded them to the spirit world—all to be brought about by direct supernatural interposition—the teachers have been called prophets.

While all goes well with the tribe the religious feeling finds sufficient expression in the ordinary ritual forms of tribal usage, but when misfortune or destruction threatens the nation or the race, the larger emergency brings out the prophet, who strives to avert the disaster by molding his people to a common purpose through insistence upon the sacred character of his message and thus furnishes support to the chiefs in their plans for organized improvement or resistance. Thus it is found that almost every great Indian warlike combination has had its prophet messenger in the outset, and if all the facts could be known we should probably find the rule universal.

Among the most noted of these aboriginal prophets and reformers within our area, all of whom are noted elsewhere under the appropriate titles, are: Popé, of the Pueblo revolt of 1680; the Delaware prophet of Pontiac's conspiracy, 1762; Tenskwatawa, the Shawnee prophet, 1805; Kanakuk, the Kickapoo reformer, 1827; Tavibo, the Paiute, Pseudo-Indian. As "pseudo-Indian" may be included forgeries of American Indian objects, implements, etc., on the one hand, and, on the other, objects, implements, etc., imitative of or closely resembling real American Indian things into whose manufacture the idea of forgery does not necessarily enter. These "pseudo-Americana" have been the subject of much archeological discussion, and some very patent frauds have long managed to maintain their existence in the field or the museum. Objects manufactured for trade purposes in imitation of real Indian articles belong here also. Of some of these last, Indians themselves have been the makers. There might be mentioned the imitations of European objects in American material, which, however, are rather pseudo-European than pseudo-American. According to McGuire (Rep. Nat. Mus. 1897, 493, 1899), a large number of the tobacco pipes of the American aborigines are in part or wholly pseudo-American—"in almost every pipe of the Iroquoian area may be traced forms distinctly copied from European sources." Pseudo-American also are the "trade pipes," "trade tomahawks," etc. This view of the pseudo-American character of many Indian pipes is not shared by David Boyle, who, however, considers many of the wampum belts now in existence to have been "entirely made by Europeans, with just enough 'Indian' in the make-up to make them pass muster among the natives for commercial and treaty purposes" (Archæol. Rep. Ontario, 55, 1901; 28, 1903). Beauchamp follows Morgan and Brinton in thinking that with the Iroquois "no existing belts antedated the Dutch settlement and trade" (Bull. N. Y. State Mus., 340, Mar. 1901). After the colonization of New York, wampum beads were manufactured by the European settlers in prodigious quantities for trade and treaty purposes. Several of the aboriginal names of Long Island refer to its importance as a wampum center. In 1844 wampum was still manufactured by whites in New Jersey and sold to Indian traders of the far W., and the best of this article was still made at Babylon, L. I., in 1850, according to Beauchamp. The great spread of the use of wampum, like that of tobacco, has been thought to be due to white influence. Beauchamp (Archæol. Rep. Ontario, 86, 1903) does not consider the bone combs found in the state of New York as really aboriginal, believing that "no New York or Canadian Indian ever made a bone comb until he had European hints." Boyle takes an opposite view. Forged and pseudo-American flint implements, pottery, and steatite images are well known to archeologists. An interesting account of the achievements of one man in the making of spurious fishhooks, spear and arrow points, cutting implements, etc., in Wisconsin, is given by Jenks (Am. Anthropol., n. s., II, 292-96, 1900), while those of a man in Michigan who has attempted to produce objects with a biblical meaning have been exposed by Kelsey (Am. Anthropol., x, no. 1, 1908). Several centers of manufacture of "antiquities" have been discovered by the experts of the Bureau of American Ethnology in various parts of the country. As pseudo-American may be classed the numerous pictographic frauds and controverted pictographs, especially those cited by Mallery (10th Rep. B. A. E., 759-67, 1893). Among these may be mentioned the Kinderhook (Ill.) copper plates, the Newark (Ohio) inscribed stone, the Pemberton (N. J.) inscribed stone ax, the Grand Traverse (Mich.) inscribed stone, the inscribed stone maul from Isle Royal (Mich.), and probably also such "mound builders' relics" as the famous Grave cr. stone. In this class may also be placed the Abbé Domenech's "Manuscript pictographique Américain," published in 1860, which Petzholdt, the German orientalist, declared to be "only scribbling and incoherent illustrations of a local German dialect" (Pilling, Algonq. Bibl., 114, 1891). Pseudo-American may also be called those "pictographs" due to weathering and other natural causes, such as those in New Brunswick described by Ganong (Bull. Nat. Hist. Soc. N. B., 175-78, 1904), and, according to Mallery, the pictured rocks of Monhegan (Me.), the mica plates of Sandusky, etc. Mallery also observes (p. 759): "With regard to more familiar and portable articles, such as engraved pipes, painted robes, and like curios, it is now well known that the fancy prices paid for them by amateurs have stimulated their unlimited manufacture by Indians at agencies, who make a practice of sketching upon ordinary robes or plain pipes the characters in common use by them, without regard to any real event or person, and selling them as significant records." The wood and stone arts of the Haida have also suffered from forgery and imitation.

There is even a pseudo-American language, the so-called Taensa of Parisot, of which an alleged grammar and vocabulary were published in Paris in 1882. The evidence seems to prove this document an entire fabrication (see Brinton, Essays Am., 452, 1890; Swanton in Am. Anthropol., x, no. 1, 1906). See Popular fallacies. (A. F. C.)

Psychology. The psychological differences between the various divisions of mankind have always been objects of speculation and ingenious inference, but out of it all has come little that can be considered definite or satisfactory. Direct positive data are scarcely to be had, and the indirect data available are far from sufficient for definite conclusions. Hence, the specific question of psychological differences between Indians and other races is still an unsolved problem. There are, however, certain points of view and some suggestive data that may be discussed under three heads:

A. Observation by psychologists.

B. Observations by teachers and other officials.

C. Evidences of differences, observable in culture.

A. Modern psychology has developed experimental methods for the study of differences in mental life, practically all of which can be successfully applied to representatives of the various races. The probability that differences will be found among them has been greatly increased by the work of Myers, Rivers, and McDougall, members of the Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to Torres straits, since the Papuans as tested for visual acuity, color vision, visual spatial perception, auditory acuity, upper limit of hearing, smallest perceptible tone-difference, olfactory acuity, discrimination of odor-strengths, memory and discrimination of odors, delicacy of tactile discrimination, localization of points touched, temperature spots, sensibility to pain, discrimination of small differences of weight, degree of size-weight illusion, reaction times, showed differences in most cases from Whites. Unfortunately, we have on record but one successful attempt to apply the methods of psychology to American natives. This is the work of Prof. R. S. Woodworth and Dr F. G. Bruner, upon such representatives of the less civilized races as were on exhibition at the Louisiana Exposition at St Louis in 1904. A full and comprehensive report on the tests for hearing has been made by Dr Bruner. He tested Indians, Whites, Filipinos, Ainu, and Congo natives as to the upper limit of hearing and auditory acuity. The results for the right ear in the test for the upper limit were as follows:

	No.	Average
Congo natives.....	6	33,223 D V. 2408
Whites.....	156	32,285 " 2344
Cocopa.....	10	32,123 " 977
School Indians.....	63	31,975 " 2663
Tehuelche.....	3	30,240 " 2651
Filipinos.....	97	29,916 " 2180
Ainu.....	7	28,846 " 1578
Kwakiutl.....	7	28,296 " 1418

The results for the left ear vary slightly from the above; but not sufficiently to make any material changes in the order as given above. Though the differences are small, the table, as a whole, indicates that, while Indians are inferior to Whites and Congo natives, they differ greatly among themselves. In the tests for acuity, the rank for the right ear was: Whites, Cocopa, School Indians, Congo natives, Tehuelche, Kwakiutl, Ainu, Filipinos; for the left ear, Whites, Congo natives, School Indians, Cocopa, Kwakiutl, Ainu, Tehuelche, Filipinos. While there is some shifting of position for the left ear, the relative positions of Whites, School Indians, and Filipinos remains the same throughout. As due allowance has been made for accidental variations in making these tests, the results may be regarded as reasonably certain. In general, they indicate that, in the ability to perceive high tones and to distinguish faint sounds, the Indians are superior to Filipinos, but inferior to Whites and Congo natives.

In addition to the above, the results of a few other tests have been reported. Color blindness has been found in three cases from a group of 250 which, so far as it goes, does not differ much from the proportion among the Whites. A few tests in reaction-time, made by Witmer, show the Indian superior to Whites and American Negroes. As previously stated, the results of these few tests suggest that, with a more extended series, numerous differences will be found between Indians and other races, as well as between the different tribes of Indians themselves.

On more general psychological grounds, unusual tendencies to hysteria and similar psychic phenomena have been assigned to the Indian. This is made probable by the readiness with which many Indians yield to suggestion in disease, jugglery, and religious activities, and has been offered as a cause for the large part played by the medicine-man on such occasions. This impression, of course, concerns Indians as compared to Whites, and not to other less civilized races. (See Physiology.)

B. Since the schools for Indians are essentially the same as those used by white children, the relative progress of Indian and white children may be taken as evidence of their respective mental powers. However, a satisfactory comparative study of Indian children in the school seems not to have been made; so that we are forced to fall back upon some general impressions and less direct evidence. It has been asserted by teachers in Indian schools that the children under their charge showed more aptitude and greater skill in many kinds of hand work than was usually encountered among white children of the same age. This is often strongly asserted with respect to drawing and penmanship. On the other hand, no critical examination of this point has been made, so that judgment must be suspended. The general experience has been that, when Indian children have passed normally from our lower schools to the college and the university, they average up to the level of the Whites; but, again, many of the cases cited are of mixed blood, and no estimates have been made of the relative number of failures to reach such a standard. Thus, while there is no direct evidence that Indians can not do the work of the school and of life as efficiently as Whites, this fact can not be taken as proof that they have the requisite ability to the same degree. The tests of Dr Bruner on the Indians in the model school at St Louis showed that, while in the auditory sense these Indians were superior to their unschooled representatives, they were still inferior to Whites selected at random. While it is true that the data for hearing prove nothing with respect to the other senses, they do suggest the presence of differences so far not overcome by education and a change of environment. Hence, the question must remain open until more data are available.

In addition to these somewhat definite systematic observations, we have the opinions of educated persons resulting from extended official or philanthropic labors among the Indians. A general statement of such opinions on the general psychological characteristics of the Indians has been given in the article on Physiology, the import of which seems to be that no definite differences exist except perhaps in the objective form of emotional reactions. Yet, so far, no one seems to have collected enough individual statements from competent persons to say what is the approximate consensus of such opinion and, even if they had, such a consensus could not be taken alone as a satisfactory solution of the problem.

C. It is customary to speak of the customs and thought prevailing among a people as their culture. Since, in all cultural activities, ideas and judgments play important parts, it has often been assumed that a detailed comparison of cultures would reveal psychological differences between the peoples to whom the cultures belonged. Indeed, some persons go so far as to assert that the existence of cultural differences necessitates the existence of psychological differences. Yet when the subject is taken on its merits, several difficulties are encountered. In the first place, some definite method of grading cultures must be devised before satisfactory conclusions as to corresponding psychological differences can be formed. As yet, no consistent way of grading as to higher and lower has been found. Further, anthropologists now believe in the existence of a tendency to conventionalize thought and the association of ideas as a factor in the differentiation of culture. Such a tendency appears when the symbolic art of such tribes as the Arapaho, Dakota, and Shoshoni are compared, each using similar designs, but associated with different kinds of ideas. Also, some claim has been made, but on less definite grounds, that Indian mythology as a whole is less closely associated with creators and gods than is the case with other peoples. In a more general way, we find everywhere among the Indians a marked tendency to inter-associate the sociological, religious, and artistic aspects of their lives to such a degree that they can scarcely be unraveled. This has sometimes been taken as one of the most characteristic aspects of Indian modes of thought. The claim is made, however, that such conventions of thought can not in themselves be taken as indications of functional differences between the minds (as such) of Indians and other races; since, on a priori grounds, what has become conventional or habitual for one may in turn become conventional for another. This theory, that all cultural differences are in no wise due to psychological differences, but to causes entirely external, or outside of the conscious life, places the inherent worth of a Pigmy, an Indian, a Mongol, and a European upon the same level, and considers culture as the sum of habits into which the various groups of mankind have fallen. While strong arguments in support of this interpretation of culture are offered by many anthropologists, together with plausible reasons for doubting the existence of fundamental psychological differences in function, so far nothing has been brought forward to render doubtful the existence of psychological differences between races analogous to those between individuals among ourselves. Modern psychological science is gradually solving the puzzle as to the kind and degree of individual psychological differences, and it is reasonable to suppose that, when these investigations have made more progress, the same methods may be successfully adapted to the comparison of tribal and other ethnic divisions of humankind.

In conclusion, it appears that we have no satisfactory knowledge of the elemental psychological activities among Indians, because they have not been made the subjects of research by trained psychologists. On the other hand, it may be said that in all the larger aspects of mental life they are qualitatively similar to other races.

Puaray ('village of the worm'). A former pueblo of the Tigua, the ruins of which have been identified by Bandelier as those on a gravelly bluff overlooking the Rio Grande in front of the s. portion of the town of Bernalillo, N. Mex. At the time of Coronado's expedition (1540-42) it was the principal settlement of the province of Tiguex, and was known to the chroniclers of the expedition by the name of the province. It was one of the two pueblos in which the Tigua took refuge and fortified themselves against the Spaniards during a siege of 50 days (see Tigua), and was the seat of the missionary labors of two of the Franciscan friars escorted to New Mexico in 1581 by Francisco Sanchez Chamuscado, but who were killed shortly afterward. The identification of Puaray with the Tiguex village of the Tiguex province of the chroniclers of Coronado's expedition is determined by statements made by the Indians to Espejo in 1583, and by the discovery there by Oñate, in 1598, of a partially effaced painting representing the murder of the missionaries. It was the seat of the mission of San Bartolomé, and had 200 inhabitants at the time of the Pueblo revolt of 1680; but the pueblo was destroyed before 1711, and was never rebuilt.

Puberty customs. The significance of a girl's entrance into womanhood was not only appreciated by all American tribes, but its importance was much exaggerated. It was believed that whatever she did or experienced then was bound to affect her entire subsequent life, and that she had exceptional power over all persons or things that came near her at that period. For this reason she was usually carefully set apart from other people in a small lodge in the woods, in a separate room, or behind some screen. There she remained for a period varying from a few days, preferably 4, to a year or even longer—the longer isolation being endured by girls of wealthy or aristocratic families—and prepared her own food or had it brought to her by her mother or some old woman, the only person with whom she had anything to do. Her dishes, spoons, and other articles were kept separate from all others and had to be washed thoroughly before they could be used again, or, as with the Iroquois, an entirely new set was provided for her. For a long period she ate sparingly and took but little water, while she bathed often. Salt especially was tabooed by the girl at this period. A Cheyenne girl purified herself by allowing smoke from sweet grass, cedar needles, and white sage to pass over her body inside of her blanket. She was also forced to sit up for long periods to prevent her from becoming lazy, and among the Haida she had to sleep on a flat rock with a bag of gravel or something similar for a pillow. If she ate too much, it was thought that she would be greedy in later life; if she talked too much, that she would become garrulous, and if she laughed, that she would become too much inclined to hilarity. A Shuswap girl would climb trees and break off their tips in order to become strong, and play with gambling sticks that her future husband might be a successful gamester. A Hupa girl must not tell a lie during this time or she would become forever untruthful. Among the Tsimshian if a girl desired a certain number of sons when married, the same number of men chewed her food for her; if she desired daughters, that office was performed by women. At the end of her fast she was covered with mats and held over a fire in order that her children might be healthy. The Shuswap, Ntlakyapamuk, Apache, Hupa, and other tribes did not allow a girl to touch her head or scratch her body except with a comb or stick. On the N. W. coast she usually wore a broad-brimmed hat to protect the sky, sun, sea, and other objects in nature from pollution and to protect herself from the deleterious influences which they in turn might exert. Often the hole for the labret was bored about this time. Among the Haida a girl was not allowed to gaze on the sea lest her face and eyes should acquire nervous, twitching movements from the motion of its waves, or on fire for fear that her face would become red. If she looked upon red salmon, her eyes would become inflamed. If a girl ate fresh salmon, the Bellacoola feared that her mouth would be transformed into a long beak; and if a Ntlakyapamuk girl ate bear meat, it was thought she would be childless. There was, in addition, a long series of food taboos in each tribe, governed by some supposed resemblance between the article of diet and phenomena of certain diseases. On the N. Pacific coast as much property as the family could afford was hung about the girl while fasting so that she might become rich in after years; and she was not allowed to do any work, so that she might become a chief's wife and be waited on by slaves. Quite different was the custom among the Ntlakyapamuk and other tribes wanting the institution of slavery where the girl spent her time in imitating various useful employments in order not to be lazy when she grew up. Among the latter people the girl was supposed to be under the special care of the Dawn, to which she continually prayed, and she made a record of her offerings and the ceremonies she had passed through by painting pictures of them on bowlders and on small stones. This, according to Teit, was believed to insure long life. Kroeber also records the execution of paintings by Luiseño Indian girls in s. California.

Among many tribes it was believed that the supernatural beings were especially offended by menstrual blood. Therefore a Haida girl at this time must not go down to the beach at low tide, lest the tide come in and cover one of the chief sources of food supply. She must not step across a small stream, lest the old woman who resides at its head leave and take all the fish with her. When her people went to a salmon creek to dry fish she must get out of the canoe just before they reached it and approach the smokehouse from behind, for if she saw a salmon jump all the salmon might leave. If a hunter's glance happened to fall upon her, blood would be injected into his eye, preventing him from seeing game, and a crust of blood would surround his spear, making it unlucky. The Alaskan Eskimo supposed that a girl was surrounded by a sort of film at this time which would attach itself to a hunter who came too near and enable every animal to see him. Fishing tackle and gambling sticks might be affected in the same way, and therefore gambling sticks and hunting and fishing implements were removed from the house, at least temporarily, when the girl had occasion to come from behind her screen. Armed with the blood of a menstruant woman a man would attack and destroy hostile supernatural powers or put to flight any by which he was himself assailed. If a menstruant girl scratched any place where one felt pain, the pain would stop. The whole period of isolation and fast usually ended with a feast and public ceremonies as a sign that the girl was now marriageable and that the family was open to offers for her hand. Although Hopi girls appear to have been spared the multifarious taboos imposed upon their sisters elsewhere, the attainment of puberty was marked by a change in the arrangement of their hair, which was then gathered into two whorls, one on each ear, symbolizing the flower of the squash; after marriage it was worn in simple braids (see Hair dressing). Among the Diegueños, girls were laid down upon green herbs caused to steam by means of a fire underneath. They were then covered with blankets and left for four days and nights, while dancing and feasting went on about them to drive away the evil spirits. Symbolic acts were also performed, such as throwing seeds over them that they might be prolific, and scattering property among the onlookers that they might be generous. According to Wissler, the Teton Dakota still perform a ceremony for girls called "singing over girls that bleed." It is rather long, and is based on the buffalo, one of the dances representing the mating of the buffalo.

Although not so definitely connected with the period of puberty, certain ordeals (q. v.) were undergone by a boy at about that period which were supposed to have a deep influence on his future career. Among these are especially to be noted isolation and fasts among the mountains and woods, sweat bathing and plunging into cold water, abstinence from animal food, the swallowing of medicines sometimes of intoxicating quality, and the rubbing of the body with fish spines and with herbs. As in the case of the girl, numbers of regulations were observed which were supposed to affect the boy's future health, happiness, and success in hunting, fishing, and war. Like the girls, Ntlakyapamuk youths made paintings upon rocks during this period in order to insure long life, and all except those who desired to become successful warriors, who addressed the Sun, also directed their prayers to the Dawn. The regulations of a boy were frequently undergone in connection with ceremonies introducing him into the mysteries of the tribe or of some secret society. They were not as widespread in North America as the regulations imposed upon girls, and varied more from tribe to tribe. It has also been noticed that they break down sooner before contact with whites.

The most detailed account of puberty customs among North American tribes is given by Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, Anthrop. I, pt 4, 1900. An interesting account of a puberty ceremony for girls among the Diegueños is given by Rust in Am. Anthrop., n. s., VIII, no. 1, 1906. See also Boas in *Reps. on N. W. Pubugna. A former Gabrieleño rancheria in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a place later called Alamitos.—Ried (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Puccoon. Any one of various plants whose juice was used by the Indians for staining and dyeing; also any one of some others to which the term has been transferred by the whites. The chief ones are: 1. Lithospermum vulgare, the puccoon of the Virginia Indians. 2. The bloodroot (Sanguinaria canadensis), called red puccoon. 3. The yellow root (Hydrastis canadensis), or yellow puccoon. The word puccoon, spelled earlier puccon, pocon, pocon, pocoan, pocones, etc., is derived, as the "pocons, a red dye," in Strachey's and Smith's vocabularies indicates, from one of the Virginian dialects of Algonquian. In s. w. Virginia puccoon is locally abbreviated 'coon.' According to Trumbull and Gerard the word is from, or from the same root as, the name for blood. (A. F. C.)

Puckkoku (Pútc-ko-hu). The Rabbit-stick clan of the Asaphratry of the Hopi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891.

Puckna. A former village of the Upper Creeks in the s. w. part of Clay co., Ala.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ala. map, 1899.

Pueblito (Span.: 'little village'). A small settlement of the Tewa of San Juan pueblo, opposite the latter, on the w. bank of the Rio Grande in Rio Arriba co., N. Mex.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 63, 1892.

Pueblito. An Acoma summer village about 15 m. n. of the pueblo of Acoma, Valencia co., N. Mex.

Titlap.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1896 (native name).

Pueblo Alto (Span.: 'high village'). Two pueblo ruins, about 500 ft apart, but both belonging to a single ancient village, situated on the top of the mesa n. of Chaco canyon, n. w. N. Mex., about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. n. of Pueblo Bonito. The main building is rectangular in form, facing s., the court inclosed by the usual semi-circular double wall which was really a series of one-story apartments. The n. wall is 360 ft long, the wings 200 and 170 ft, respectively. The rooms are from 15 to 20 ft long and 8 to 12 ft wide. The walls are almost entirely thrown down. The smaller building is about 75 ft square and much better preserved, some second-story walls being still intact. This building contains some of the best plain masonry to be found in the Chaco Canyon group. There is a large circular kiva in the small building and traces of 7 in the large one. A quarter of a mile e. of the ruins is a wall extending n. and s. 1,986 ft. Other walls extend toward this from the main building but do not connect with it. Pueblo Alto is reached from the canyon by a tortuous stairway through a narrow crevice just back of Pueblo Bonito. See Jackson in 10th Rep. Hayden Surv., 1878. (E. L. H.)

Ki-a-a.—Lummis in Land of Sunshine, xv, 425, 1901.

Pueblo Blanco (Span.: 'white village'). A ruined pueblo of the Tano on the s. border of the Galisteo plain, n. central New Mexico.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 116, 1892.

Pueblo Blanco. A former pueblo, presumably of the Piroe, on the w. rim of the Médano, or great sand-flow, e. of the Rio Grande, about lat. $34^{\circ} 30'$, New Mexico. It was probably inhabited in historic times.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 278, 281, 1892.

Pueblo Bonito (Span.: 'beautiful village'). The central and most important ruin of the Chaco Canyon group in n. w. New Mexico. The building, which stands within 70 ft of the n. wall of the canyon, is of dark brown sandstone, semielliptical in form. Its length e. and w. is 667 ft, greatest depth n. and s. 315 ft. It was originally 5 stories high, there being portions of the fifth-story wall still standing. The greatest height of standing wall at present is 48 ft, 39 ft being above the detritus; probably half of the original walls remain standing. The rooms are mostly rectangular, but there are many of irregular form, semicircular, trapezoidal, elliptical, triangular, etc., owing to the subsequent addition of rooms to the original structure, several such additions and remodelings being evident. In fact, no unit of original plan is discernible, and additions seem to have been made within, without, and upward as needed. The masonry of Pueblo Bonito ranges from plain rubble to what appears to be ornamental mosaic in places. Every type of masonry known to Pueblo architecture is found in this building, and not fewer than 27 circular kivas, varying from 10 to 50 ft in diameter, have been uncovered in it. The kiva is in every instance a circular room built within a square or rectangular one, the space between the walls being filled with earth and masonry. In some cases the interior of the kivas is of fine tablet masonry, alternating with bands of larger blocks, giving an ornamental finish. The fireplaces are of the most primitive character. The timbering is exceptionally heavy, logs 40 ft in length and 18 in. in diameter having been found. The doorways vary from 24 by 36 to 30 by 50 in.; the lintels are straight, smooth poles about 3 in. in diameter; windows vary from 6 by 12 to 12 by 16 in. Extensive excavations have been made in Pueblo Bonito by the Hyde Exploring Expedition; the collections found are now in the American Museum of Natural History, New York.

Pueblo Caja del Rio. A very ancient pueblo on a rocky bluff 3 m. n. e. of Cochiti, in the so-called Caja del Rio, so named from the "boxing" of the canyon of the Rio Grande here, in Sandoval co., N. Mex. Concerning it Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 80, 1892) says: "Whether the Tehuas [Tewa], the Tanos, or some other unknown tribe were the builders of it I am unable to say. The people of Cochiti disclaimed all knowledge of its former occupants. The amount of arable land in the vicinity is sufficient; for the population, as I estimate it, could not have exceeded 400."

Chin-a Ka-na Tze-shu-ma.—Bandelier, op. cit., 80 ('the old houses on the river': Cochiti name.) Ti-tji Hün-at Ka-ma Tze-shu-ma.—Ibid. ('the old houses in the north': another Cochiti name.)

Pueblo Colorado (Span.: 'red village'). A ruined pueblo of the Tano on the s. border of the Galisteo plain, n. central New Mexico.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 116, 1892.

Pueblo Colorado. A former pueblo, presumably, of the Piro on the w. rim of the Médano, or great sand-flow, e. of the Rio Grande, about lat. $34^{\circ} 30'$, New Mexico. It was probably inhabited in historic times.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 278, 281, 1892.

Pueblo del Alto (Span.: 'village of the height,' so called on account of its situation above the reach of inundation). A prehistoric village, probably of the Piro, the ruins of which lie on the E. side of the Rio Grande, 6 m. S. of Belen, N. Mex.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 237, 1892.

Pueblo de la Parida (Span.: 'village of the woman lately delivered'). A former pueblo, presumably of the Piro, on the W. rim of the Médano, or great sand-flow, E. of the Rio Grande, about lat. 34° 30', New Mexico. It was probably inhabited in historic times.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 278, 281, 1892.

Pueblo del Arroyo (Span.: 'village of the gulch'). An important ancient pueblo less than ½ m. below Pueblo Bonito, in Chaco canyon, N. W. N. Mex. It is on the N. side of the arroyo, on its very brink, is rectangular in form, and faces eastward. The western wall is about 270 ft long, and the 2 wings 125 and 135 ft respectively. The extremities of the wings are connected by a semicircular double wall, the space between being occupied by a series of rooms. Portions of the third-story wall are standing. The original height was probably 4 stories. The heavy floor timbers, averaging about 10 in. in thickness, are still in place. There are 2 kivas in the court, 3 built within the pueblo walls, and 4 outside the main building. The largest is 37 ft in diameter. The masonry is of dull brown sandstone, well laid in adobe mortar.

Pueblo del Encierro (Span.: 'village of the inclosure'). A former pueblo, probably Keresan, described as being some distance above Tashkatze, which is opposite Cochiti, in N. central New Mexico. The Tano of Santo Domingo disclaim its former occupancy by their people.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 179–81, 1892.

Pueblo de los Jumanos. A former large village of the Jumano (q. v.), situated in the "Salinas" E. of the Rio Grande, central New Mexico, in the vicinity of Tabira, or the so-called Gran Quivira. The definite location of the pueblo is not known, although it is supposed to have been situated near the base of the elevation called Mesa de los Jumanes. In 1598 the northern division of the Jumano occupied 4 villages in this region, but before 1629 they lived in tipis and were semi-nomadic. In the latter year they were gathered in a "great pueblo" to which the name San Isidoro was applied by the Franciscan missionaries, and an attempt made at their conversion. The Pueblo de los Jumanos was mentioned by Escalante in 1778—fully a century after the abandonment of the Salinas by the Tigua and the Piro. According to Escalante the pueblo was destroyed by the Apache, who were the scourge of the Pueblos during this period. (F. W. H.)

Pueblo de los Silos. A large Tano village situated in the Galisteo basin, between the Keresan pueblos of the Rio Grande and Pecos, N. Mex., in 1540; so called by the Spaniards of Coronado's expedition because of the large underground cellars found there stored with corn. The village had the appearance of newness, but because of depredations by the Teya, a Plains tribe, 16 years before, only 35 houses were inhabited, the remainder having been destroyed. See Castañeda in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 453, 523, 570, 1896. Pueblo de los silos.—Castañeda, op. cit., 453. Zitos. Mota-Padilla (1742). Hist. Nueva Galicia, 164, 1870 (apparently identical).

Pueblo Largo (Span.: 'long village'). A former Tano pueblo of the compact, communal type, situated about 5 m. S. of Galisteo, N. Mex. It was possibly occupied in the 16th and the beginning of the 17th centuries.—Bandelier (1) in Ritch, N. Mex., 201, 1885; (2) in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 125, 1890; iv, 106, 1892; (3) Gilded Man, 222, 1893.

Pueblo Nuevo (Span.: 'new village'). A Tepehuane pueblo in S. Durango, Mexico, near Mezquital r.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 319, 1864.

Pueblo Pintado (Span.: 'painted village'). An important ancient pueblo ruin, of yellowish gray sandstone, situated near the head of the Chaco wash, on the low mesa to the S., in Chaco canyon, N. W. N. Mex. It is the most easterly of the Chaco Canyon group. The building is L-shaped, the 2 wings measuring 238 ft and 174 ft, exterior measure. The extremities of the wings are connected by a row of small apartments. The inclosed court was occupied by 2 kivas and other semisubterranean structures, while just outside the court is another large kiva. The standing outer walls are still about 28 ft high; the original height was probably about 40 ft. This ruin is surrounded by about 10 ruins of minor pueblos, all within a mile of the main building. The surrounding region is an absolute desert.

The site is an exceedingly interesting one because of its situation, being well toward the top of the continental divide and likely to contain important evidences of contact with the Pueblos of the Rio Grande drainage, particularly Jemez. See Simpson, Exped. to Navajo Country, 81, 1850; Jackson in 10th Rep. Hayden Surv., 1878. (E. L. H.)

Pueblo Raton (Mex.-Span.: 'rat village'). An Indian village in 1763 on Cayo Ratones, about New r. inlet, s. e. coast of Florida (Roberts, Fla., 21, 1763). The inhabitants were probably a remnant of the ancient Tequesta tribe. (J. M.)

Pueblos ('towns', 'villages', so called on account of the peculiar style of compact permanent settlements of these people, as distinguished from temporary camps or scattered rancherias of less substantial houses). A term applied by the Spaniards and adopted by English-speaking people to designate all the Indians who lived or are living in permanent stone or adobe houses built into compact villages in s. Colorado and central Utah, and in New Mexico, Arizona, and the adjacent Mexican territory, and extended sometimes to include the settlements of such tribes as the Pima and the Papago, who led an agricultural life. The Pueblo people of history comprise the Tanoan, Keresan (Queres), and Zuñian linguistic families of New Mexico, and the Hopi, of Shoshonean affinity, in N. E. Arizona. These are distributed as follows, the tribes or villages noted being only those now existent or that recently have become extinct:

LINGUISTIC STOCK.	GROUP.	TRIBES OR VILLAGES.
Tanoan	Tewa	Nambe, Tesuque, San Ildefonso, San Juan, Santa Clara, Pojoaque (recently extinct), Hano.
	Tigua	Isleta, Sandia, Taos, Picuris, Isleta del Sur (Mexicanized).
	Jemez	Jemez, Pecos (extinct).
	Tano	Practically extinct.
	Piro	Senecu, Socorro del Sur (both Mexicanized).

LINGUISTIC STOCK.	GROUP.	TRIBES OR VILLAGES.
Keresan (Queres)	Eastern	San Felipe, Santa Ana, Sia, Cochiti, Santo Domingo.
	Western	Acoma, Laguna, and outlying villages.
Zuñian	Zuñi	Zuñi and its outlying villages.
Shoshonean	Hopi	Walpi, Sichomovi, Mishongnovi, Shipaulovi, Shongopovi, Oraibi.

Habitat.—The Pueblo tribes of the historical period have been confined to the area extending from N. E. Arizona to the Rio Pecos in New Mexico (and, intrusively, into w. Kansas), and from Taos on the Rio Grande, New Mexico, in the N., to a few miles below El Paso, Texas, in the s. The ancient domain of Pueblo peoples, however, covered a much greater territory, extending approximately from w. Arizona to the Pecos and into the Texas panhandle, and from central Utah and s. Colorado indefinitely southward into Mexico, where the remains of their habitations have not yet been clearly distinguished from those of the northern Aztec.

History.—Of the Pueblo tribes the Zuñi were the first to become known to civilized people. In 1539 Fray Marcos of Niza, a Franciscan, journeyed northward from the City of Mexico, accompanied by a Barbary negro known as Estevan, or Estevanico, who had been a companion of Cabeza de Vaca and the two other Spanish survivors of Narvaez's expedition, shipwrecked in the Gulf of Mexico in 1528. The negro went ahead of the friar to prepare the way, but contrary to instructions reached a province that became known as the Seven Cities of Cibola, unquestionably identified with the Zuñi villages of w. New Mexico, far in advance of Fray Marcos. Here Estevanico, with some of the Indians who had followed him, was killed by the Zuñi. A few days later the friar viewed from an adjacent height a town identified as Hawikuh, the first one seen in journeying toward the N. E.; then planting a cross and taking formal possession of the new country in the name of Spain, he hastened back to the City of Mexico, where he presented a glowing report of what he had seen and heard.

Fired with enthusiasm at the report of riches in the northern country, the Viceroy Mendoza organized an expedition, under Francisco Vasquez de Coronado, which, for wealth of equipment and for the prominence of the men who accompanied it, has never been equaled in the annals of American exploration. Guided by Fray Marcos of Niza, the expedition departed from Compostela, Feb. 23, 1540, and reached Culiacan Mar. 28. On Apr.

22 Coronado departed from the latter place with 75 horsemen, leaving the main force to follow, and reached Hawikuh, which he named Granada, on July 7. The Indians showing hostility, the place was stormed by the Spaniards and the inhabitants were routed after Coronado had almost lost his life in the attack. Exploring parties were sent in various directions—to the Hopi villages of Tusayan, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, the Rio Grande valley, and the buffalo plains—nowhere finding the expected wealth but always encouraged by news of what lay beyond. The main army reached Cibola in September, and departed for Tiguex (the country and chief village of the present Tigua Indians), about the present Bernalillo, on the Rio Grande, where winter quarters were established. The natives revolted owing to atrocities committed by the Spaniards, but the uprising was quelled after a long siege and the killing of many Indians. In the following April (1541) Coronado started with his entire force, under the guidance of an Indian nicknamed "The Turk," evidently a Pawnee, whom he had found living among the Pueblos, to explore a province to the far eastward called Quivira (q. v.). The Spaniards were led astray by the guide, whom they later executed; the main force was sent back to the Rio Grande, and a picked body finally reached the buffalo country of E. Kansas. In the spring of 1542 Coronado's force started on their return to Mexico. Two missionaries were left behind—Fray Juan de Padilla, who went to Quivira, and Fray Luis, a lay brother, who remained at Pecos. Both were killed by the natives whom they expected to convert. In Coronado's time the Pueblos were said to occupy 71 towns, and there may have been others which the Spaniards did not enumerate.

The Pueblos were visited successively by several other Spanish explorers. Francisco Sanchez Chamuscado, in 1581, escorted three Franciscan missionaries to the Tigua country of the Rio Grande, but they were killed soon after. Antonio de Espejo, late in 1582, started with a small force from San Bartolomé in Chihuahua for the purpose of determining the fate of the missionaries. He traversed the Pueblo country from the Hopi villages of N. E. Arizona to Pecos in New Mexico, and returned to San Bartolomé by way of Pecos r. Espejo's itinerary is traceable with no great difficulty, and most of his tribal names are readily identified. His estimates of population, however, are greatly exaggerated—in some cases at least ten times too large. Following Espejo, in 1590, was Gaspar Castaño de Sosa, who with a party of 170 persons followed up the Pecos as far as the pueblo of that name, which is described as having five plazas and sixteen kivas; the pueblo was provided with much maize, and the pottery and the garments of the men and women aroused admiration. One of the most important of all the expeditions was that of Juan de Oñate, the colonizer of New Mexico in 1598 and founder of Santa Fé seven years later; for by reason of it the Pueblo tribes were first definitely influenced by civilization. Traveling northward, Oñate reached on May 22 the first pueblos of the Rio Grande—those of the Piro in the vicinity of the present Socorro. A party was sent to visit the pueblos of the Salinas, E. of the Rio Grande, and the main body reached the Tigua country a few weeks later, finding there, at Puaray village, evidences of the murder of the friars in 1581. Other pueblos were visited, the natives taking the oath of obedience and homage in each instance, and several saint names were applied that have remained to this day. The Pueblo country was divided into districts, to each of which a priest was assigned, but little was done toward the founding of permanent missions during Oñate's stay. The first settlement of the Spaniards was established, under the name San Gabriel de los Españoles, on the Rio Grande at the Tewa village of Yukewingge, at the mouth of the Rio Chama, opposite San Juan pueblo; it remained the seat of the colony until the spring of 1605, when it was abandoned and Santa Fé founded.

Active missionary work among the Pueblos was commenced early in the 17th century, and although many baptisms were made by the few resident friars little was done toward actual conversion. The condition of affairs in 1629 is set forth in the Memorial written by Fray Alonso Benavides, the custodian of the Franciscan Order in the province, published in the following year. The appeal of Benavides resulted in the sending of 30 new missionaries and the founding of many new missions from the Hopi country and the Zuñi in the W. to the pueblos of the Salinas in the E. Substantial churches and monasteries were erected with the aid of the natives, and much was done toward concentrating the Indians with a view of more readily effecting their Christianization. Toward the middle of the century difficulties arose between the civil officials and the missionaries, in which the Indians became involved. Finally the latter, led by a native of San Juan named Popé (q. v.), arose in revolt in August, 1680, killing 21 of the 33 missionaries, about 375 other colonists of a total of about 2,350, and destroying the missions, together with their furnishings and records. Governor Otermin and the surviving colonists took refuge in the government buildings at Santa Fé, and withstood a siege by about 3,000 Indians for 10 days, when, after a desperate sortie, the Indians were forced back with a loss of 300 killed and 47 captured. The prisoners were hanged, and the next day (Aug. 21) the Spaniards, numbering about 1,000, commenced their long retreat to El Paso. Evidently in fear lest the Spaniards should return at any time with a strong force, many of the Pueblos abandoned their settlements and took refuge in new ones on less pregnable sites, leaving the former villages to crumble. For 12 years the Pueblos remained independent of the Spaniards, but not free from dissension among themselves or from depredations by their old enemies, the Navaho and the Apache. In 1692 Diego de Vargas reconquered the province after severely chastising many of the natives and destroying some of their towns. Of all the pueblos of New Mexico at the beginning of the revolt (at which time there were 33 active missions, while others were mere visitas) only Acoma and possibly Isleta continued to occupy their former sites after the conquest. In 1696 some of the Pueblos once more rebelled, killing several missionaries, but they surrendered after having been again severely punished by Vargas. From this time the Pueblos have been notably peaceful toward the whites, the only exception being in Jan., 1847, when the Taos Indians, instigated by some misguided Mexicans, killed Gov. Charles Bent and some other Americans and took refuge in their fortified town and mission church, which were stormed by troops with a loss to the Indians of about 150 killed outright, while a number were later tried and hanged.

Arts and industries.—While the material culture of the sedentary people of this great territory, as revealed by ethnological and archeological investigations, is sufficiently homogeneous to warrant its designation as "the Pueblo culture," there are many local differences in architecture and in building materials, due chiefly to the influence of environment. In the northern portions particularly, and scattered here and there almost throughout the area, are the remains of dwellings built in recesses of cliffs or canyon walls, in some cases the natural cavities having been enlarged or modified by artificial means, in others the cliff face having been practically honeycombed to serve as habitations. These are the cliff-dwellings (q. v.) built and occupied by the ancestors of the present Pueblos, no doubt for purposes of defense against ancient enemies. In the valleys and on the mesa tops the structures varied according to the available building materials and to the exigencies of the sites. In the northern parts of the Pueblo area the houses were generally of sandstone, readily quarried near at hand; in some places blocks of lava, or tufa, were used. In the southern valleys, especially along the Gila and the Salt, adobe (q. v.) was the material usually employed. The groups of dwellings were generally compact structures of several stories, with many small rooms made necessary owing partly to the scarcity of suitable timber for roofing larger structures and partly to the lack of means of transporting it, for, like other Indians, the Pueblos had no horses or donkeys before the coming of the whites. The villages were often rectangular, with open courts, but usually there was little fixed plan of outline, new dwellings being added wherever and whenever need demanded (although sometimes influenced by the direction of the sun), often resulting in great community groups of houses forming irregularly oblong, square, semicircular, circular, and elliptical ground-plans, with wings and minor projections. The pueblos were generally built in terrace fashion; i. e., the upper tiers of houses were set back of those next below, so that the roofs of the lower stories formed a kind of front yard for those next above. Unlike the dwellings of to-day, the lower stories were without doors, entrance being gained by means of ladders and a hatchway in the roof. The upper houses were and still are reached by means of movable ladders, or by masonry steps built against the outer walls and resting on the roofs of the houses below. In the ancient pueblos the fireplace was generally in the form of a shallow box or pit in the middle of the floor, the smoke finding egress through the hatchway as in some of the kivas to-day. Corner fireplaces were also in use, but chimneys, as well as the dome-shaped ovens built on the ground or on the roofs, and paneled doors and shutters, were doubtless derived from the Spaniards. Floors were paved with stone slabs or plastered smooth with adobe mortar like the walls and roofs. Accompanying each pueblo was at least one kiva (q. v.); indeed the belief has been advanced that the kiva formed the nucleus of the ancient pueblo, which grew up around it. The houses are constructed and owned by the women, the men helping with the heavy work, such as quarrying stone and hauling and emplacing the beams. The Pueblos made good basketry (q. v.), but it is not the equal of that of some of the tribes of N. California, although some of the Hopi manufacture basket plaques in two distinct styles of weaving, excellently ornamented with anthropomorphic and other figures in harmonious colors derived from native substances, now largely superseded by the dyes of commerce. As potters and weavers the Pueblos have not been excelled by any Indians N. of Mexico (see Pottery, Weaving). Their earthenware vessels, ancient and modern, consist of practically every form known to the aborigines, from large rough cooking and storage vessels to delicately modeled and elaborately painted jars, bowls, platters, bottles, ladles, and box-shaped utensils.

Many of the ancient Pueblos, especially those of the northern area, may be designated as horticulturists rather than as agriculturists, so intensive was their method of cultivation. Their small fields were irrigated from living streams or from storage reservoirs, the chief crop being corn. Cotton also was raised, the product being woven into everyday clothing and ceremonial cloaks, kilts, and leggings, which were extensively traded to other tribes. The Hopi were and still are the principal cotton weavers of all the Pueblos, but the native cotton has given place almost entirely to trade stuffs. After the introduction of sheep by the Spaniards, the weaving of native wool, as well as of strands of bayeta on rude hand looms, became an important industry. It is believed that weaving was introduced among the Navaho by Pueblo women adopted into that tribe. Many so-called "Navaho blankets" are really the product of Hopi and Zuni looms, operated by both men and women. In the southern Pueblo area especially, agriculture was conducted on a large scale, and elaborate and extensive systems of irrigation (q. v.) were employed. Such works, utilized by an entire community, were constructed under a communal system; and indeed this method is still largely followed by all the Pueblos. In addition to fields of corn, wheat, pumpkins, melons, etc., small garden patches of onions, beans, chile, etc., near the houses are cultivated, water being daily conveyed to them in jars by the women, to whom the gardens belong.

In addition to their agriculture the Pueblos hunted to some extent, and there are still some excellent hunters among them. The deer, antelope, bear, and mountain lion were the larger game sought, and the eastern Pueblos hunted also the buffalo on the plains. Rabbits abound throughout the Pueblo country, and are hunted individually as well as by large groups of men and boys, who surround a wide area and gradually drawing together entrap the rabbits and dispatch them with boomerang-shaped hunting sticks. Traps also are employed, especially for catching small mammals and birds, including eagles, which are highly prized on account of their feathers, so largely used in ceremony. Fish and other products of the water are never eaten, and various animals are tabooed as food by the members of certain clans. In early times the turkey was domesticated, and there is evidence that large flocks were "herded" in much the same manner as are sheep and goats at the present time. A few turkeys, as well as eagles, are still kept in captivity, but only for their feathers. The only other domestic animal was the dog, but there is no evidence that the Pueblos employed this animal as a beast of burden like the tribes of the plains (see Domestication, Traits). Horses, asses, horned cattle, sheep, and goats, like wheat, grapes, peaches, and apples, now more or less extensively grown, were not known to the Indians before the coming of the Spaniards in the 16th century. In Arizona, in association with ancient ruins, pictographs and figurines representing a llama-like quadruped have been found, the rock-pictures indicating the animals as being herded by men with bolas.

The ancient clothing of Pueblo men consisted typically of a short tunic of deerskin and trousers of the same material reaching to the knees; leggings of skin or of cotton, fastened at the knees, held in place by a narrow garter woven in pattern; and moccasins of deerskin with rawhide soles neatly sewn with sinew. Knitted footless stockings of yarn are now commonly worn by both men and women, with or without leggings. A piece of skin (now usually fresh goatskin), with hairy side inward and entirely incasing the foot, was used over the moccasin in snowy weather. The breechcloth is universally worn by males.

The warriors wore a close-fitting cap of skin, ventilated with numerous holes and decorated with feathers; this cap is still worn as a part of the ceremonial costume of the Priests of the Bow, of Zuni. Evidence produced by excavation in the cliff-dwellings indicates that garments woven of yucca fiber, as well as of cotton with feathers, were also used in early times. Sandals of yucca or other fibers were worn instead of moccasins. The hair of the Pueblo men is "banged" above the eyes, cut horizontally at the neck line, and the back hair gathered and tied with a woven band into a tight knot behind. A headband, now usually a bandana handkerchief, is always worn by men and boys of the western Pueblos, but those of the Rio Grande valley, except during ceremonies, wear the hair in side plaits and require no headband. After the introduction of sheep, woven woolen garments largely replaced the skin tunics and trousers of the men, and the cheap cotton fabrics of commerce in time superseded woolen goods to a great extent. Robes of twisted strands of rabbit skin and wildcat skin were worn in cold weather, and were employed also as bedding; but these have given place almost entirely to the bright-colored blankets, identical with these-called "Navaho blankets," of native wool, bayeta, or commercial yarn, woven by both men and women among the Zuni and the Hopi, and worn especially on gala occasions. The ornaments of the men consist of necklaces of ground and drilled shell and turquoise beads, turquoise being mined in considerable quantity at Los Cerillos, N. Mex. (the Queres of San Felipe serving as the chief traders in the product); and of ear and neck pendants of the same materials, and beautifully executed mosaics of shell and turquoise and other colored stones. Leather belts and wrist-guards ornamented with large disks of coin silver are commonly worn and are highly prized, and leggings and moccasins are usually studded with silver buttons. German silver and copper are sometimes employed for ornamentation, but these metals are not highly regarded by the Pueblos. Their metal-working process was derived from the Spaniards.

The clothing of the women now consists of a woolen dress of native weave, knee-length, made in the form of a blanket, the two ends being sewn together; the garment is worn over the right shoulder and under the left, and belted at the waist with a very long woven sash, usually of red and green wool, fringed at the ends and tucked in; a cotton shirt extending to the knees; for indoor use, knitted leggings of yarn; for outdoor use, and especially on gala occasions, leggings consisting of an entire deerskin wrapped round and round from below the knee to the ankle and forming part of the moccasins of the same material. The leggings and moccasins, unlike those of the men, are not dyed. The women wear also a light cotton mantle, and when the weather demands, a woolen blanket similar to the blankets above mentioned. A valued possession is the "ceremonial blanket" of white cotton, embroidered, knotted, and fringed. Among some of the Pueblos the hair of the married women is banged slightly in front, parted in the middle, and wrapped in two coils back of the ears; girls who had reached the marriageable age had the hair arranged in two large whorls at the sides of the head: these among the Hopi (who alone among the Pueblos now employ this method of hair-dressing) represents squash blossoms, symbols of fertility. Other Pueblo women do not bang the hair, but part it in the middle and wear it in a braid at each side. Necklaces, pendants, bracelets, earrings, and finger rings of silver are commonly worn, particularly during outdoor ceremonies, and on gala occasions Hopi girls wear as ear pendants small tablets ornamented with turquoise mosaic.

Social and religious organization.—Every Pueblo tribe is composed of a number of clans or gentes, these terms here being employed to indicate descent in the female or the male line, respectively. The clans vary greatly in number. The little pueblo of Sia, for example, with only about a hundred inhabitants, is represented by 16 existing clans, while 21 others are traceable though extinct. Among some of the Pueblos, notably the Hopi, there is evidence of a phratral grouping of the clans. Most of the clans take their names from natural objects or elements, especially animals and plants, and are divided into regional or seasonal groups, depending more or less on the habits and habitat of the related animals, plants, or other objects or elements from which they take their names, and on various religious beliefs. There is evidence that originally a priest or religious chief presided over each clan. (For the names of the clans, see under the several tribes.)

Of the mythology, religion, and ceremonies of the Pueblos comparatively little has been recorded thus far except in so far as the Zuñi, Hopi, and Sia are concerned. Among the Zuñi there are many organizations embracing secret orders whose functions pertain to war, healing, hunting, agriculture, magic, religion, etc., although it should be said that the religious motive enters largely into all their activities. In these ceremonial organizations the cardinal directions play a prominent part, each important society, according to Cushing, representing a distinct region; for example, the Pihlakwe, or Bow priesthood of the Zuñi, represent the west, the Shumekwe the east, the Newekwe or Galaxy people the upper region, the Chitolakwe or Rattlesnake people the lower region, etc. Each society has its own series of rites and ceremonies, some of which are performed in secret, while others, in the form of public dances, are elaborate and impressive. The origin of these organizations and the mythology and religious beliefs underlying them are too complicated to admit of even an outline here. On this subject the reader should consult (for the Zuñi) Cushing, (1) Zuñi Creation Myths, in 13th Rep.

B. A. E., (2) Zuñi Folk Tales, 1901, and Mrs Stevenson in 5th and 23d Reps. B. A. E.; (for the Hopi) Fewkes in the 15th, 16th, 19th, and 21st Reps. B. A. E., and various articles in Am. Anthr., Jour. Am. Folk-lore, and Jour. Am. Eth. and Arch.; (for the Sia) Mrs Stevenson in 11th Rep. B. A. E.

All the Pueblos are monogamists, and the status of women is much higher than among most tribes. Among the tribes in which descent is reckoned through the mother, at least, the home is the property of the woman, and on the marriage of her daughters the sons-in-law make it their home. Marriage is effected with little ceremony, and divorce is lightly regarded, the wife having it in her power to dismiss her husband on a slight pretext, the latter returning to his parents' home, sometimes for a trifling cause; in such cases either is free to marry again. There are many instances, however, in which men and women marry but once, spending their lives together in perfect accord and happiness. Labor is divided as equitably as possible under the circumstances. As among other tribes, the women perform all domestic duties as well as some of the lighter farm work, especially at harvest time; but unlike most Indian women those of the Pueblos are helped by the men in the heavier domestic work, such as house-building and the gathering of fuel, while men also weave blankets, make their wives' moccasins, and perform other labors usually regarded in Indian life as a part of women's work. Like the houses, the small garden patches are the property of the women, who alone cultivate them, and the carrying of water and the making of pottery are also strictly women's functions. The children are spoken of as belonging to the mother; i. e., among most of the Pueblos they belong to the clan of the mother; and in this case, at least, if the father and the mother should separate, the children remain with the latter. Children are very obedient and only on very rare occasions are they punished.

Originally the government of the Pueblos was controlled by the priesthood, the various functions of government, as war and peace, witchcraft, hunting, husbandry, etc., being regulated by representatives of the societies pertaining thereto. On the advent of the Spaniards the outward form of the government of most of the tribes was changed by the establishment of a kind of elective system and the control of strictly civil affairs by a governor, a lieutenant-governor, and a body of aldermen, so to call them. All the Pueblos except the Hopi still successfully maintain this system of local government; but all affairs of a religious or ceremonial nature are controlled by the priesthood.

Population.—The statistics of population of the Pueblo tribes are not satisfactory, owing to the unreliability of some of the estimates, especially in the earliest period of Spanish exploration, due in part to the desire to exaggerate the Indian population in order to attract greater attention to the country from Spain and Mexico. The table on the opposite page, compiled from various sources, gives the population of the various Pueblos from 1630 to the present time. In some instances the figures are approximate estimates only, and may be regarded as little more than broad guesses; at other times the count was evidently closely made.

As will be seen, the table does not include the Piro and Tigua pueblos of the lower Rio Grande in Texas and Chihuahua, nor the Hopi (q. v.) of Arizona. In 1725 the total population was given at 9,747; in 1749, 11,942; in 1793, 7,455, and in 1794, 9,495. These figures include the lower Rio Grande villages. In 1885 the Indians of 19 pueblos of New Mexico, including Zuñi, were reported to number 7,762. In 1887 the population of all the New Mexican pueblos was given as 8,357. From these figures it is evident that the Pueblo population has varied little during the last two centuries.

Following is a list of pueblos, now extinct or Mexicanized, which are as yet either unidentified or unclassified: Aca-cagua, Acoti ("birthplace of Montezuma"), Atica, Aychini, Bagnacat, Casa Blanca, Casa del Eeo, Casa Grande, Casa Montezuma, Castildavid, Chettrokettle, Chichilticalli, Cristone, Hungopavi, Kin-nazinde, Kintyel, Nogales, Pagmi, Paguemi, Peñasco Blanco, Pequen, Poblazon, Pueblo Alto, Pueblo Bonito, Pueblo del Arroyo, Pueblo de los Silos, Pueblo Pintado, Pueblo Viejo, San Rafael de los Gentiles, Sargarría, Siemas, Triati, Una Vida, Urraca, Vini, Wejegi, Xutis, Yncapi, Ytriza. For pueblos classified by tribes, see Hopi, Jemez, Keresan, Piro, Tano, Tewa, Tigua, Zuñi. (F. W. H.)

Pueblo Viejo (Span.: 'old village'). The name given to that portion of Gila valley from Pima to San José, between Mt Graham and the Bonita mts., s. Ariz., on account of the ruins of prehistoric habitations there. The name was earlier applied to an important ruin (see Buena Vista) and later to the settlement of San José near its site. See Fewkes (1) in Am. Anthr., xi, June 1898; (2) 22d Rep. B. A. E., 168, 172, 1904.

Pueblo Viejo. A village of mixed Tepehuane and Aztec population, in the s. part of the Territory of Tepic, Mexico. Although Spanish is here largely used, outsiders are not permitted to settle in the village. Only the old people speak Nahuatl correctly; the Tepehuane influence is strong, even in the ancient religion of the people.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., 1, 473, 1902.

Puerta Chiquita (Span.: 'little port or gateway'). A rancheria of 18 Mission Indians on Gov. Gage's ranch, San Diego co., Cal. By act of Congress of May 27, 1902, these and others on Warner's ranch were removed in 1903 to a new reservation purchased for them at Pala. They are probably Diegueño or Luiseño.

Puerta de la Cruz (Span.: 'gateway of the cross'). A former Diegueño rancheria on upper San Luis Rey r., San Diego co., s. Cal., later on Agua Caliente res. No. 1, occupied by Warner's ranch. By court decision the 14 survivors were compelled to vacate, and, under act of Congress of May 27, 1902, were assigned a new tract purchased for them at Pala in 1903.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 175, 1902; 118, 1903.

Puerta de San José (Span.: 'gateway of St Joseph'). A former Diegueño rancheria on upper San Luis Rey r., San Diego co., Cal.—Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Miss. Ind., 20, 1883.

See Isleta. See Nambé. Probably includes San Cristóbal. See Pecos. Includes Tomé and Belén. Probably includes Cuyamunquẽ and Jacona. Includes Galisteo. Includes Galisteo. Includes Santa Ana. Includes Spaniards. Established about 1700.

Puerto (Span.: 'gateway'). Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871) in 1598 with a number of other Keresan and Tano pueblos of New Mexico, to one of which groups it doubtless belonged. See Tuerto.

Puerto.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 97, 1892 (misprinted from Oñate).

Puguviliak. A Yuit Eskimo village at Southwest cape, St Lawrence id., Bering sea.

Poogoviliak.—Elliott, Our Arct. Prov., 457, 1886.

Poogovillyak.—Ibid. Pugupiliak.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902 (quoted as erroneous). Puguviliak.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

Puhksinahmahyiks ('flat bows'). A band of the Siksika, or Blackfeet.

Flat Bows.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 208, 1892. Puh-ksai-nah'-mah-yiks.—Ibid.

Puichon. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Puimem (pui 'east', mēm 'water': 'eastern water,' the local native name for Pit r.). A Wintun tribe formerly living on Pit r., Shasta co., Cal.

Pu'-i-mim.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 230, 1877.

Puimuk (pu-i 'east', mok 'people': 'eastern people'). A Wintun tribe formerly occupying lower Elder and Thomas crs., Tehama co., Cal., and a strip of country on the E. side of Sacramento r. They were almost constantly at war with the Noamlaki, a highland tribe, and were finally forced by them to abandon their own country.

Poomocs.—Powers in Overland Mo., XII, 531, 1874. Pu'-i-mok.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 230, 1877.

Puisascamin. An unidentified tribe or band formerly in the neighborhood of Hudson bay or the upper lakes, trading with the French.—La Barre (1683) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 798, 1855.

Puisu (Wintun: 'people living east'). A tribe or subtribe of the Shastan family (Curtin), or of mixed Copehan and Shastan (Powers), formerly living at the great bend of Pit r., in Shasta co., Cal. Curtin makes them a part of the Ilmawi tribe. According to Powers they were a mixed people resulting from intermarriage between the Wintun and Shastan tribes.

Madéqai.—Curtin, Ilmawi vocab., B. A. E., 1889.

Poomocs.—Powers in Overland Mo., XII, 530, 1874.

Pu'-i-su.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 230, 1877. Pu'-shūsh.—Ibid.

Pujetung. A spring settlement of Kingua Okomiut Eskimo on an island in Cumberland sd., near the entrance to Nettilling fjord, Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Pujunan Family. A linguistic family named by Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 99, 1891) from a former Nishinam settlement, properly called Pusune, between American and Sacramento rs., Cal. As the family includes only a single group, known as Maidu (q. v.), a description of the tribal group serves also for the family. The Maidu constitute one of the larger stocks of N. California and occupy the area E. and W. between Sacramento r. and the E. boundary of the state, and N. and S. from the vicinity of Lassen peak to the N. fork of the Cosumnes. Within this area three divisions of the Maidu may be recognized, a Northwestern, a Northeastern, and a Southern, each differing from the others to some degree in language and culture.

In all probability the Spaniards, during their occupancy of California, came in contact with representatives of the Maidu, but little has been recorded in regard to them. The first appearance of these people in literature dates practically from the time of the U. S. exploring expedition in 1838–1842, when the overland party traversed the entire Sacramento valley, coming in contact with the Maidu and with the other families of the region. The acquisition of California by the U. S. soon after this time, and the great impetus to immigration given by the discovery of gold, put an end to the isolation of the family, and, as the territory occupied by the Maidu lay in the heart of the mining district, led to their rapid decrease. A few were transferred at an early date to reservations nearer the coast, but to-day almost all the survivors are scattered through the sierra and foothills near the sites of their old homes.

In general culture the Maidu may be regarded as typical of the Indians of central California. Living in permanent villages they depended mainly on acorns, seeds, and other natural vegetal products for food, although fish and game, particularly in the mountains, formed a portion of their diet. Their dwellings were circular, conical-roofed lodges built of poles, bark, brush, and grass, and often covered, particularly in the Sacramento valley region, with a heavy layer of earth. The floor was sunk a foot or more in the ground, and access was by a door at one side, sometimes prolonged into a passageway, while a smoke hole at the top of the structure gave light and ventilation. Similar but larger structures served as dance or assembly houses. Their arts were few and simple. Where any method of navigation was employed, they made use of rude balsas, or of dugouts, propelled by poles. Bows and arrows were their chief weapons, although spears and slings were also used. In summer they wore little clothing, the men often going entirely naked. The men wore knitted net caps, the women basket caps. Carving and painting were unknown, and the chief means of expressing the esthetic sense was in basketry, in the manufacture of which the Maidu were very skilful, making baskets of several types and ornamenting them with many interesting designs. No trace of a clan system has been found among them, and their social organization seems to have been very loose. They were divided into many small village communities whose chiefs or headmen had little actual power. The dead were buried as a rule, although cremation was sometimes practised. The most notable feature of their religious beliefs and ceremonies was the autumnal "burning," or sacrifice of property to the dead, in which large offerings of all sorts of property were made by friends and relatives. They had also many dances, in which elaborate and costly feather head-dresses were worn. The object of many of these dances was the increase of food animals. The mythology of the Maidu is rich, the most distinctive feature being a long and detailed creation myth. The present survivors of the Maidu probably number fewer than 500. Sixty years ago their number was doubtless considerable; a conservative estimate of the total population just previous to the gold rush would be 5,000 to 6,000. For the villages see Maidu, Nishinam. Consult Dixon, The Northern Maidu, Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pt. 3, 1905. (R. B. D.)

Pukwaawun. One of the principal villages of the Betonukeengainubejig Chipewa of w. Wisconsin, in 1850.

Pukwaawun.—Ramsey in Ind. Aff. Rep., 85, 1850.

Puk-wa-wanuh.—Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 191, 1885.

Pulacuam. An unidentified tribe named in Massanet's list of tribes between central Coahuila and the Hasinai country of Texas in 1690. The tribes are given in geographical order in general, and the indication is that this one resided near the border between the Coahuiltecan and the Tonkawan groups, falling rather in the latter district (Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, 1716, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 183, MS.). The only known tribe suggested by the name is the Sulujame, which was at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas (Valero Bautismos, MS., passim). (H. E. B.)

Pulakatu (Pu'-lak-a-tu). A former Nishinam village in the valley of Bear r., which is the next stream n. of Sacramento, Cal.

Pulacatoo.—Powers in Overland Mo., xii, 22, 1874.

Pu'-lak-a-tu.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 316, 1877.

Pumham (contraction of Pumoham, 'he goes by water.'—Gerard). A sachem of the region about Warwick, R. I. (Drake, Inds. of N. Am., 257, 1880), described by Hubbard as "one of the stoutest and most valiant sachems that belonged to the Narragansetts." It was in his country that the Rev. Samuel Gorton took refuge in 1642, to the displeasure of the authorities of Massachusetts. Pumham joined in King Philip's war, and his town was burned by the English in 1675. He escaped in the defeat of the following year, but was soon afterward captured and slain. (A. F. C.)

Pummy ('fish oil or grease'). A New England term. Used by Holman F. Day in Ainslee's Magazine (xiv, 81, 1904): "If that ain't porgy pummy I'm smellin'." From one of the Algonquian languages of the New England region, the derivation is seen from Massachusetts pummee, Abnaki pemi, Lenape pomih, oil, fat, grease. (A. F. C.)

Puna. The Cactus Fruit clan of the Chua (Snake) phratry of the Hopi.

Pöna.—Voth, Trad. of Hopi, 84, 1905. Pü-nañ'-nyu-mä.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vi, 364, 1893 (nyu-mä = people, usually applied by this author to designate a phratry). Pü-na'wuñ-wü.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vii, 402, 1894 (wuñ-wü = clan). Pü'n-e.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 38, 1891.

Punames (Keresan: Pu-na-ma, 'people in the west,' referring to the western division of the Rio Grande branch of the Keresan stock). Mentioned by Espejo in 1583 as a province comprising 5 towns, of which Sia (q. v.) was the largest. In Hakluyt's version of Espejo's narrative the name is misprinted "Cunames," which in turn is corrupted into "Cuames" in Ogilby's America, 1671. Strangely enough these corrupted forms closely resemble the Keresan term Cuame, signifying 'people in the south,' but they bear no relation to that word. Santa Ana formed one of the other pueblos of the group. See Espejo in Doc. Inéd., xv, 115, 178, 1871; Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 193, 1892. (F. W. H.)

Cuames.—Ogilby, America, 291, 1671 (misprint). Cumanes.—Whipple, Pac. R. R. Rep., iii, pt. 8, 114, 1856 (misquoting Hakluyt). Cunames.—Mendoza, Hist. of China (1586), in Hakluyt, Voy., iii, 461, 469, 1600 (after Espejo, 1583). Cunanes.—Dobbs, Hudson Bay, 163, 1744. Cuuames.—Purchas, Pilgrimes, v, 855, 1626. Pumames.—Espejo (1583) in Doc. Inéd., xv, 115, 1871. Punames.—Ibid., 178. Punanes.—Dobbs, op. cit. Purames.—Hinton, Handbook to Ariz., 387, 1878.

Punaryou (Pun-ar'-you, 'dog standing by the fireside'). A subclan of the Delawares.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Pung. An old New England term for a rude sort of box sleigh, a cutter or jumper. Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 504, 1877) cites one description of a pung: "Sledges, or pungs, coarsely framed of split saplings, and surmounted with a large crockery crate." Prof. W. F. Ganong (inf'n, 1903) states that pung is very much used now in New Brunswick, applied to box sleighs, especially of a rather good kind. The word is a reduction of Tom Pung, itself a corruption of toboggan (q. v.). (A. F. C.)

Pungoteque (from pungoteku, 'sand-fly river.'—Gerard). A village of the Powhatan confederacy in Accomac co., Va., probably near Metomkin inlet. It was nearly extinct in 1722.

Pungoteque.—Beverley, Va., 199, 1722. Punkotink.—Herrman, map (1670) in Rep. on Bdy. Line between Va. and Md., 1878.

Punishment. See Captives, Ordeals.

Punk. See Punkie.

Punkapog (probably from pankwapog, 'shallow pond.'—Gerard). A former village of Praying Indians near Stoughton, Norfolk co., Mass. It was settled originally by some Indians who removed from Cohannet in 1654 and who numbered about 60 souls in 1674, and was one of the few Praying towns in existence after King Philip's war in 1675–76. A few Indians were still there in 1792.

Punkie (also punky, punk). A minute gnat, called also sand-fly or midge (Simulium nocivum), the bite of which produces an intolerable itching and smarting sensation as if a spark of fire had dropped upon the naked skin. These winged atoms are, says Loskiel, "called by the [Lenape] Indians ponk, or 'living ashes,' from their being so small that they are hardly visible, and their bite as painful as the burning of red-hot ashes." Another species is the black fly, so well known as the scourge of travelers in the N., of which pest Sir Alexander Mackenzie remarks that "it is the most tormenting insect of its kind in nature."

Punky, or punkie, is from the Dutch of New York and New Jersey punki, pl. punkin, from (by vocalic addition) Lenape pünk or ponk, short for pünkus, cognate with Chippewa píngosh, Cree pík-kus, Abnaki pékus, etc., all names for the sand-fly, and from the root pünkü, píngu, píkkü, pékü, 'to be pulverulent,' 'ashes-like.' (W. R. G.)

Punonakanit. A Nauset village near Wellfleet, Barnstable co., Mass. Some Praying Indians were there in 1764.

Pononakanit.—Hist. of Eastham in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., VIII, 159, 1802. Punonakanit.—Bourne (1764), ibid., I, 196, 1806.

Puntlatsh. A Salish tribe on Baynes sd. and Puntlatsh r., E. coast of Vancouver id. In 1893 they numbered 45; in 1896, the last time their name appears in the Canadian Reports on Indian Affairs, the "Punt-ledge, Sail-up-Sun, and Comox" numbered 69, since which time they have apparently been classed with the Comox. The Puntlatsh dialect embraces the Puntlatsh, Saamen, and Hwa-hwatl. (J. R. S.)

P'untlatsh.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 10, 1889. Puntlatsh.—Tolmie and Dawson, Vocab. Brit. Col., 119B, 1884. Punt-ledge.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1893, 302, 1894.

Punuk. A Yuit Eskimo village on Punuk id., E. of St Lawrence id., Bering sea, Alaska.

Peenock.—Elliott, Our Arct. Prov., 443, 1886.

Punxsutawny (Lenape: Punksuteney, 'gnat town.'—Gerard). A former Delaware village under the jurisdiction of the Six Nations of New York; situated on Big Mahoning cr., in Jefferson co., Pa., in 1755. It was deserted in 1758. (J. N. B. H.)

Eschentown.—Guss, Hist. Juniata and Susquehanna Val., chap. II, 61, 1835. Ponchestanning.—Post, Jour. (1758), in Pa. Archives, III, 542, 1853. Punksutenay.—Guss, op. cit.

Punyeestye (Keresan: 'place to the west on the bank of a stream'). Formerly a summer village of the Laguna Indians (q. v.), now a permanently inhabited pueblo of that tribe, situated 3 m. W. of Laguna, N. Mex.

Pun-yeest-ye.—Pradt quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthr., IV, 346, 1891. Punyistyi.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895. Santa Ana.—Pradt, op. cit. (common Spanish name).

Puretnay. A former Tigua pueblo on the summit of the round mesa of Shienuai, or Mesa de las Padillas, 3 m. N. of Isleta, N. Mex. According to tradition it was abandoned on account of witchcraft before the Spanish discovery of New Mexico, part of the inhabitants moving N. W., the remainder settling at Isleta, where their descendants still dwell. According to Bandelier it probably formed one of the pueblos of the province of Tiguex, visited by Coronado in 1541. If this be the case it may be identical with the Pura of Oñate in 1598.

Hyem Tu-ay.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 130, 1890; IV, 232, 1892 (probably a misprint of the name of the mesa). Pura.—Columbus Mem. Vol., 155, 1893 (misprint of Oñate's Pura). Poo-reh-tá-ai.—Lummis, Man Who Married the Moon, 130, 1894. Pura.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., XVI, 115, 1871 (probably identical). Pur-e Tu-ay.—Lummis quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 232, 1892.

Purificación. A rancheria, probably Papago, 12 leagues from Agua Escondida, near the Arizona-Sonora boundary, probably in a S. E. direction; visited by Anza in 1774.—Anza quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 389, 1889.

Purísima Concepción. The eleventh Franciscan mission founded in California. Its establishment was postponed for the same reason as that of Santa Barbara, but on Dec. 8, 1787, the formal ceremonies were performed by Lasuen and the new mission dedicated to La Purísima Concepción. Owing to its being the rainy season the party returned to Santa Barbara and work was not begun until the spring. The site chosen, which was called by the natives Algsacupí, was near the present town of Lompoc, Santa Barbara co. There were numerous villages in this vicinity; the natives were intelligent and industrious, and within the following twenty years nearly all the population in the district had been baptized. In 1790 there were 234 neophytes; in 1800, 959, and in 1804, 1,522, the highest number reached. In live stock this was one of the most prosperous missions in California, having 10,015 large stock and 10,042 small stock in 1810. The average crop for the preceding decade was 3,300 bushels. Though the population decreased after 1804, numbering 1,297 in 1810, and 1,127 in 1820, the material prosperity increased till after the latter date, and the cattle continued to increase until after 1830, when 13,430 large stock were reported. The first church erected was a very crude structure, and in 1802 a better one, of adobe roofed with tile, was completed. This, together with most of the other buildings, was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake in 1812. After this a new site, called Amun by the natives, 5 or 6 m. away on the other side of the river, was selected, and here a new church was built, being finished in 1818. In 1824 the neophytes, in conjunction with those at Santa Inés, revolted and took possession of the mission, but the fathers were not molested, and the soldiers and their families were allowed to retire; four white men and several Indians however were killed. An expedition was sent down from Monterey, and the Indians, who in the meantime had fortified themselves within the mission buildings, were attacked and forced to surrender, after a battle in which six of them were killed and a large number wounded. Several Indians were condemned to death for the killing of the white men, and others imprisoned or banished. The buildings were much damaged during the trouble, and in 1825 a new church was dedicated. Five years later there were 413 neophytes, and 407 in 1834. Up to that time the total number of baptisms was 3,232, of whom 1,492 were children. In 1844 the mission was reported as without property or agricultural land, but with a vineyard and about 200 neophytes. Most of these died of smallpox shortly afterward. In 1845 the mission was sold for $1,110. The buildings were deserted and allowed to decay, although a considerable portion of the walls is still standing. In 1905 the Landmarks Club acquired possession of the buildings and the immediate grounds, with the intention of preserving the church from further decay. The Indians of this neighborhood belonged to the Chumashan linguistic family (q. v.). See also California Indians; Mission Indians of California; Missions. (A. B. L.)

Purísima Concepción de Acuña. A Franciscan mission established in 1731 on San Antonio r., about 1 m. below the present San Antonio, Texas, under the protection of the presidio of San Antonio de Béjar. Prior to this time it was situated near Angelina r., in E. Texas, and was known as La Purísima Concepción de los Ainaí (q. v.). Pop. 207 in 1762, the number of baptisms having been 792; it had also 600 cattle, 300 horses, and 2,200 sheep. In 1785 the population was only 71, and in 1793, 51. It ceased to exist as an independent mission before the close of the century. In 1785 it was said to have the best church in the province, being valued, with other property, at $35,000. See Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 1886; Garrison, Texas, 1903.

Purísima Concepción de los Ainaí. A mission established in July 1716 among the Hasinai, near Angelina r., 9 leagues from San Francisco de los Neches, Texas. It was abandoned during the French-Spanish hostilities of 1719, when the mission property was destroyed by the Indians. In Aug. 1721 it was reestablished with 400 Indians, and new buildings were erected. It was transferred to San Antonio r. in 1731, becoming known as La Purísima Concepción de Acuña (q. v.). The designation of this mission as "Purísima Concepción de los Asinaís" came from a miscopy of the word "Ainaí" in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, fol. 163. See Bolton in Texas Hist. Quar., xi, no. 4, 259, note 5, 1908; Garrison, Texas, 50, 1903; and Bancroft cited below. (H. E. B.)

Purutea. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Pusher Paho. See Pashipaho.

Pushmataha (Apushim-alhtaha, 'the sapling is ready, or finished, for him.'—Halbert). A noted Choctaw, of unknown ancestry, born on the E. bank of Noxuba cr. in Noxubee co., Miss., in 1764; died at Washington, D. C., Dec. 24, 1824. Before he was 20 years of age he distinguished himself in an expedition against the Osage, w. of the Mississippi. The boy disappeared early in a conflict that lasted all day, and on rejoining the Choctaw warriors was jeered at and accused of cowardice, whereon Pushmataha replied, "Let those laugh who can show more scalps than I can," forthwith producing five scalps, which he threw upon the ground—the result of a single-handed onslaught on the enemy's rear. This incident gained for him the name "Eagle" and won for him a chieftaincy; later he became mingo of the Oklahannali or Six Towns district of the Choctaw, and exercised much influence in promoting friendly relations with the whites. Although generally victorious, Pushmataha's war party on one occasion was attacked by a number of Cherokee and defeated. He is said to have moved into the present Texas, then Spanish territory, where he lived several years, adding to his reputation for prowess, on one occasion going alone at night to a Tonaqua (Tawakoni?) village, killing seven men with his own hand, and setting fire to several houses. During the next two years he made three more expeditions against the same people, adding eight scalps to his trophies. When Tecumseh visited the Choctaw in 1811 to persuade them to join in an uprising against the Americans, Pushmataha strongly opposed the movement, and it was largely through his influence that the Shawnee chief's mission among this tribe failed. During the War of 1812 most of the Choctaw became friendly to the United States through the opposition of Pushmataha and John Pitchlynn to a neutral course, Pushmataha being alleged to have said, on the last day of a ten days' council: "The Creeks were once our friends. They have joined the English and we must now follow different trails. When our fathers took the hand of Washington, they told him the Choctaw would always be friends of his nation, and Pushmataha can not be false to their promises. I am now ready to fight against both the English and the Creeks." He was at the head of 500 warriors during the war, engaging in 24 fights and serving under Jackson's eye in the Pensacola campaign. In 1813, with about 150 Choctaw warriors, he joined Gen. Claiborne and distinguished himself in the attack and defeat of the Creeks under Weatherford at Kantchati, or Holy Ground, on Alabama r., Ala. While aiding the United States troops he was so rigid in his discipline that he soon succeeded in converting his wild warriors into efficient soldiers, while for his energy in fighting the Creeks and Seminole he became popularly known to the whites as "The Indian General." Pushmataha signed the treaties of Nov. 16, 1805; Oct. 24, 1816; and Oct. 18, 1820. In negotiating the last treaty, at Doak's Stand, "he displayed much diplomacy and showed a business capacity equal to that of Gen. Jackson, against whom he was pitted, in driving a sharp bargain." In 1824 he went to Washington to negotiate another treaty in behalf of his tribe. Following a brief visit to Lafayette, then at the capital, Pushmataha became ill and died within 24 hours. In accordance with his request he was buried with military honors, a procession of 2,000 persons, military and civilian, accompanied by President Jackson, following his remains to Congressional Cemetery. A shaft bearing the following inscriptions was erected over his grave: "Pushmataha a Choctaw chief lies here. This monument to his memory is erected by his brother chiefs who were associated with him in a delegation from their nation, in the year 1824, to the General Government of the United States." "Push-ma-taha was a warrior of great distinction—He was wise in council—eloquent in an extraordinary degree, and on all occasions, and under all circumstances, the white man's friend." "He died in Washington, on the 24th of December, 1824, of the croup, in the 60th year of his age." General Jackson frequently expressed the opinion that Pushmataha was the greatest and the bravest Indian he had ever known, and John Randolph of Roanoke, in pronouncing a eulogy on him in the Senate, uttered the words regarding his wisdom, his eloquence, and his friendship for the whites that afterward were inscribed on his monument. There is good reason to believe, however, that much of Pushmataha's reputation for eloquence was due in no small part to his interpreters. He was deeply interested in the education of his people, and it is said devoted $2,000 of his annuity for fifteen years toward the support of the Choctaw school system. As mingo of the Oklahannali, Pushmataha was succeeded by Nittakechi, "Day-prolonger." Several portraits of Pushmataha are extant, including one in the Redwood Library at Newport, R. I., one in possession of Gov. McCurtin at Kinta, Okla. (which was formerly in the Choctaw capitol), and another in a Washington restaurant. The first portrait, painted by C. B. King at Washington in 1824, shortly before Pushmataha's death, was burned in the Smithsonian fire of 1865. Pu'-un-t'-ci-wa'-ūn.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Puyallup. An important Salish tribe on Puyallup r. and Commencement bay, w. Wash. According to Gibbs, their designation is the Nisqualli name for the mouth of Puyallup r., but Evans (Bancroft, Hist. Wash., 66, 1890) says the name means 'shadow,' from the dense shade of its forests. By treaty at Medicine creek, Wash., Dec. 26, 1854, the Puyallup and other tribes at the head of Puget sd. ceded their lands to the United States and agreed to go upon a reservation set apart for them on the sound near Shehahnam cr., Wash. In 1901 there were 536 on Puyallup res., Wash.; in 1909, 469. See Niskap.

Puycone. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Puye (Tewa: Pu-ye', 'assembling place of cottontail rabbits'.—J. P. Harrington). A large ruined pueblo of worked blocks of tufa on a mesa about 10 m. w. of the Rio Grande and a mile s. of Santa Clara canyon, near the intersection of the boundaries of Rio Arriba, Sandoval, and Santa Fé cos., N. Mex. Along the southern face of the mesa, extending for many hundreds of yards, is a series of cliff-dwellings or cavate lodges excavated in the tufa, and formerly provided with porches or shelters, the roof-beams of which were set in holes in the wall of the cliff. The pueblo and the cliff-dwellings are attributed to certain clans of the Tewa, and the cliff-dwellings have been occupied in part at least during the historical period, although they are doubtless of prehistoric origin. Pyrite, or Iron pyrites. The glistening yellow crystals of disulphid of iron, sometimes called "fool's gold," occurring plentifully in many sections of the country. The crystals, which present a handsome appearance, were occasionally employed by the Indians for ornaments and amulets, and are found now and then in the kit of the medicine-man. They were also used in connection with stone as strike-a-lights. See Iron. (W. H. H.)

Pythagoreans. A name applied by Lahontan to certain Indians he claimed to have met on his "Long" r. Probably imaginary, although Barcia refers to them apparently in good faith.

Pitagoriciens.—Lahontan, Nouv. Voy., I, 158, 1703 (French form). Pitagoricos.—Barcia, Ensayo, 292, 1723 (Span. form). Pythagoreans.—Lahontan, New Voy., I, 121, 1703.

Qailertatang (Khai-ler-te'-tang). Amazons of Central Eskimo mythology. They have no men among them, but masked figures of them mate the couples in a Saturnalian festival.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 605, 640, 1888.

Qanikilak (Q'ānikilak). An ancestor of a Nakomgilisala gens, after whom the gens itself was sometimes called.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Quabaug (said to be contracted from Msquabaug, or Msquapaug, 'red (or bloody) pond'). A tribe or band, probably of the Nipmuc group, formerly living in Worcester co., Mass. Their principal village, near the site of Brookfield, bore their name. They joined the revolt under King Philip in 1675, abandoned their territory, and never returned.

Quackcohowaon. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the s. bank of Mattapony r., in King William co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Quacoshatchee. A former Cherokee settlement in the n. w. part of Pickens co., S. C.; destroyed during the Revolutionary war.

Quacoratchie.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., pl. clxi, 1899. Quacoratche.—Mouzon's map (1771) quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887.

Quahatika. A small Piman tribe, closely allied to the Pima, of whom they are an offshoot and with whom they still intermarry to some extent. They live in the desert of s. Arizona 50 m. s. of the Gila r., speak a dialect slightly different from that of the Pima, and subsist by agriculture. They manufacture better pottery than that of their congeners, and are said to have introduced cattle among the Pima from the Mexicans about 1820. They formerly made arrows of yucca stalks which they bartered to their neighbors. It is said that about the beginning of the 18th century the Quahatika occupied with the Pima the village of Aquitun (Akuchini, 'creek mouth'), w. of Picacho, on the border of the sink of Santa Cruz r., but abandoned it about 1800. Their chief settlement is Quijotoa. Kohátk.—Curtis, Am. Ind., ii, 112, 1908 (Papago name). Kwahadk'.—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E., passim, 1908. Kwohatk.—Hrdlička in Am. Quahaug. See Quahog.

Quahmsit. A village, probably Nipmuc, perhaps identical with Quantisset, whose warriors were with other hostile Indians in 1675 at Manexit, N. E. Conn.—Quana-paug (1675) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., vi, 205, 1800.

Quahog. A name in use in New England for the round or hard clam (Venus mercenaria); spelt also quahaug. This word is probably a reduction of poquah- hock in the Narraganset, the same as poquahoc in the Massachusetts dialect of Algonquian, the Indian name for this shellfish. The last half of the word has survived in English, while in Nantucket the first part has come down as poquaw. The word appears also as cohog, and even in the truncated form hog. As a place name it appears in Quogue, a village in Suffolk co., N. Y. (A. F. C.)

Quaitso. A Salish division on the coast of Washington, n. of the Quinaielt, of which tribe they are probably a part. In the time of Lewis and Clark (1806) they numbered 250, in 18 houses. In 1909 there were 62, under the Puyallup school superintendency, Wash.

Qualacu. Mentioned by Oñate in 1598 as the second pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), traveling northward. It was the most southerly of the Piro settlements on the e. bank of the Rio Grande, being situated near the foot of the Black mesa, on or near the site of San Marcial, N. Mex. Trenaquel was the most southerly of the Piro villages on the w. bank of the river. Consult Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 250, 1871; Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 131, 1890; iv, 252, 1892. (F. W. H.)

Qualatchee (correct form unknown). A former Cherokee town on the headwaters of Chattahoochee r., Ga. Another settlement of the same name was situated on Keowee r., S. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 529, 1900.

Qualatche.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792 (given as on Flint r.).

Qualla (Kwa'N, Cherokee pronunciation of "Polly", from an old woman who formerly lived near by). The former agency of the East Cherokee and now a P. O. station, just outside the reservation, on a branch of Soco cr., in Jackson co., N. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. Quanstaguo. The tribal name given in 1728 for an Indian woman at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas. The only clue to her tribe's affiliation is that she was married to a Pazac or a Patzau (Valero Entierros, 1728, part. 87, MS.) (H. E. B.)

Quanaukaunt. See Quinney.

Quano. Given by Kane (Wand. in N. A., app., 1859) as the name of a tribe at C. Scott, N. W. end of Vancouver id., but Boas explains it as merely the native name for the cape. The people included under the designation, said to number 200, must have been part of the Nakomgilisala. (J. R. S.)

Quanmugua. A Chumashan village W. of Pueblo de las Canoas (San Buenaventura), Ventura co., Cal., in 1542. In the Muñoz MS. this name is given, but in the Cabrillo narration (Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857) the name is divided, probably erroneously, and stands for two towns, Quannin and Gua.

Quanquis. Mentioned by Oñate as a pueblo of New Mexico in 1598. It was doubtless situated in the Salinas, in the vicinity of Abó, E. of the Rio Grande, and in all probability belonged to the Tigua or the Piro.

Quanquiz.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 118, 1871. Zuanquiz.—Columbus Mem. Vol., 164, 1893 (misprint).

Quapa. A former Gabrieleño village in Encino or San Fernando valley, Los Angeles co., Cal.—Padre Santa María (1796) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 553, 1886.

Quapaw (from Ūqikhpa, 'downstream people'). A southwestern Siouan tribe, forming one of the two divisions of the Dhegiha group of Dorsey. At the time of separation the Quapaw are supposed to have gone down the Mississippi, and the Omaha group, including the Omaha, Kansa, Ponca, and Osage, up the Missouri. There is undoubtedly a close linguistic and ethnic relation between the Quapaw and the other four tribes. The recorded history of this tribe is commonly supposed to begin with the chronicles of De Soto's expedition (1539-43). In the relation of the Gentleman of Elyas and that of Bledna, they or their chief band are mentioned under the name Pacaha, and in that by Garcolasso de la Vega under the name Capaha, the latter being nearer the true pronunciation, though the author wrote only from information and manuscripts furnished, while the former two were members of the expedition. The people of the tribe, or rather of one portion or division of it, were found in a strongly fortified village, which one of the chroniclers, probably with some exaggeration, describes as "very great, walled, and beset with towers." He adds: "Many loopholes were in the towers and wall . . . a great lake came near unto the wall, and it entered into a ditch that went round about the town, wanting but little to environ it around. From the lake to the great river [Mississippi] was made a weir by which the fish came into it" (French, Hist. Coll. La., pt. 2, 172, 1850). He further says: "And in the town was great store of old maize and great quantity of new in the fields [the date was June 19]. Within a league were great towns, all walled." Their village was on the W. bank of the Mississippi, N. of Arkansas r., within the limits of the present Arkansas, probably in Phillips co. There are archeological remains and local conditions in this county which suit exactly the description of Pacaha: the lake on one side, Mississippi r. on the other, the connecting channel, and the island near by. There is, it is true, a locality in Crittenden co. where the ancient works, lake, channel, river, and island are all found, but this locality does not agree so well with the narration. The statement by early French explorers, who found them below the mouth of St Francis r., that they had removed from their old town, where the outworks were still to be seen, a short distance to the n., indicates that they had been in that region for many years. Their traditional history seems to have a substantial basis. Father Gravier, in the description of his voyage down the Mississippi in 1700, remarks (Shea's trans., 120, 1861) that Wabash and lower Ohio rs. were called by the Illinois and Miami the river of the Akansea (Quapaw), because the Akansea formerly dwelt on their banks. Three branches were assigned to it, one of them coming from the s. w. and passing behind the country of the Miami, called the river St Joseph, "which the Indians call properly Ouabachei." The Quapaw are known historically and from other evidence to have been mound builders, and also builders of mounds of a given type. A mound group containing mounds of this type is found in s. w. Indiana on the Ohio near its junction with the Wabash; and further, there is a map of the War Department showing the territory claimed by the Quapaw, which borders the Ohio from this point downward. Dorsey found traditions among the tribes composing his Dhegiha group asserting a former residence s. of the Mississippi, and the separation of the Quapaw from the other tribes, apparently in s. Illinois, the former going down the Mississippi and the other tribes up Missouri r., whence the names Quapaw (Uqikha), 'those going downstream or with the current,' and Omaha, 'those going upstream or against the current.' Whether the Akansea of the tradition include also the other tribes of the Dhegiha is uncertain.

QUAPAW MAN

It was not until about 130 years after De Soto's visit, when the French began to venture down the Mississippi, that the Quapaw again appear in history, and then under the name Akansea. The first French explorer who reached their country was the missionary Marquette, who arrived at the village of the Akansea in June 1673, accompanied by Joliet. On his autograph map (Shea, Discov. and Expl. Miss., 1852) the name Papikaha, apparently on Arkansas r. some distance above its mouth, is a form of Quapaw; but Akansea, on the e. bank of the Mississippi, apparently opposite the mouth of the Arkansas, must have been another Quapaw village, not the one visited by Marquette, which was on the opposite side, as Gravier found them on the w. side and said that he "cabined a league lower down, half a league from the old village of the Akansea, where they formerly received the late Father Marquette, and which is discernible now only by the old outworks, there being no cabins left" (Shea, Early Voy., 126, 1861). Biedina, one of the chroniclers of De Soto's expedition, says that a village on the e. bank was tributary "like many others" to the sovereign of Pacaha. La Salle (1682) found three villages of the tribe along the Mississippi r., one on the w. bank, the next 8 leagues below on the e. bank, and another 6 leagues below on the w. bank at the mouth of the Arkansas r. This order is given in describing the descent and ascent of the stream. Tonti mentions as Akansea villages Kappa on the Mississippi, and Toyengan, Toriman, and Osotony inland (French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 60, 1846). La Môtairie, La Salle's notary, in his expedition down the Mississippi in 1682, mentions the Akansea villages as follows: "On the 12th of March we arrived at the Kapaha village, on the Arkansas. Having established a peace there and taken possession, we passed on the 15th another of their villages situated on the border of their river, and also two others farther off in the depth of the forest, and arrived at that of Imaha, the largest village of this nation" (French, Hist. Coll. La., 2d s., ii, 21, 1875). In July, 1687, 2 of their villages were, according to Joutel, on Arkansas r., the others being on the Mississippi. St Cosme, who descended the Mississippi with Tonti in 1698, found the tribe, or at least 2 of the villages, decimated by war and smallpox, the disease having destroyed "all the children and a great part of the women." He estimated the men of the 2 villages at 100. De l'Isle's map of 1700 places the Acansea village on the s. side of Arkansas r. Gravier (1700) locates the village of Kappa on the Mississippi half a league from the water's edge and 8 leagues above the mouth of the Arkansas. Tourima seems to have been close by. Gravier says: "The Sitteoui Akansea are five leagues above its [the Arkansas'] mouth and are much more numerous than the Kappa and Tourima; these are the three villages of the Akansea." A document of 1721 (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 622, 1855) says, on what authority is unknown, that the "Acansea" who were on the E. side of the Mississippi, as has been noted above, differed from the "Acansia" who dwelt on the w. side. Nuttall says the people called Arkansa by Charlevoix were then (1761) made up of confederated remnants of ruined tribes.

At the time Le Page Dupratz visited that section, a few years later, it seems the Akansea had retired up the Arkansas r. and were living about 12 m. from the entrance of White r., and had been joined by the Michigamea and some Illinois. Sibley (1805) states that the Arkansa were then in 3 villages on the s. side of Arkansas r. about 12 m. above Arkansas Post. They claimed to be the original proprietors of the country on Arkansas r., extending up it about 300 m. to the Osage country. According to a Mexican document there were 150 families on Sulfur cr., a southern affluent of Red r. of Texas, in 1828. Porter in 1829 said they were then in the Caldo country on Red r. in Louisiana. In 1877 they were on their reservation in the s. e. corner of Indian Ter., and in that year the Ponca tribe was brought on their reservation for a short time, being removed to the present Ponca res., w. of the Osage, in 1878. Most of the Quapaw soon left their reservation and removed to that of the Osage.

On account of the great change wrought in the condition of these Indians by contact with the whites, their true character and customs can be learned only by reference to the accounts of the early explorers. Father Zenobius (Le Clercq, Estab. Faith, Shea ed., 2, 168, 1881) says: "These Indians do not resemble those at the north, who are all of a morose and stern disposition; these are better made, civil, liberal, and of a gay humor." Joutel says they are strong, well made, and active; "the females better made than those of the last village [Cahinnio?] we passed." That the people had made considerable advance in culture is evident from the accounts given of their structures; as, for example, the walled village described above. They also built large mounds—the height of one is given as 40 feet—on which they placed, in some instances, their chief buildings. Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 442, 1878) mentions a house "built on a place a little elevated [mound]," of great pieces of wood jointed one with another dovetailed to the top, of beautiful cedar (cedre) wood (cypress?), and covered with bark. Their village houses he describes as long, with "domed" roofs, each containing several families. Mention is made of a fish weir near one of their villages, in an artificial canal, and of nets which De Soto's followers utilized on their arrival for procuring a supply of fish. The Akansea were active tillers of the soil, and also manufacturers of pottery, many of the finest specimens taken from the mounds of E. Arkansas in all probability having been made by this tribe. Their drum was made by stretching skin over a large pottery vessel. Du Poisson (1727) speaks of their painted designs on skins. A matachee, he says, "is a skin painted by the Indians with different colors, and on which they paint calumets, birds, and animals. Those of the deer serve as cloths for the table, and those of the buffalo as coverings for the bed." The same author describes their dress of ceremony as "well mataché, that is having the body entirely painted of different colors, with the tails of wildcats hanging down from places where we usually represent the wings of Mercury, the calumet in their hands, and on their bodies some little bells" (Kip, Early Miss., 258, 1866). Their method of disposing of their dead was by burial, often in the floor of their houses, though usually they were deposited in graves, sometimes in mounds; sometimes the body was strapped to a stake in a sitting position and then carefully covered with clay. Though polygamy was practised to some extent, it was not common.

The population of the Quapaw at the time of De Soto's visit in 1541 must have been considerable, as the number of those of the village of Pacaha, who fled to the island on the approach of the Spaniards, is given as 5,000 or 6,000. Father Vivier (1750) speaks of the "Akansas" as "an Indian tribe of about 400 warriors," equaling 1,400 to 1,600 souls (Kip, Early Miss., 318, 1866). Porter (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes), gives 500 as their number in 1829. In 1843 they numbered 476. In 1885 there were 120 on the Osage res. and 54 on the Quapaw res.; and in 1890 the total number on both reservations was given as 198. The population in 1909, including all mixed-bloods, was 305, all under the Seneca School superintendency, Okla.

The following are the gentes of the Quapaw as obtained by J. O. Dorsey: Zhawe (beaver), Wazhinka (small bird), Wasa (black bear), Te (buffalo), Petang (crane), Nanpanta (deer), Shangke (dog), Khidh (eagle), Anpan (elk), Hu (fish), Mantu (grizzly bear), Hangka (ancestral), Tangdhangtanka (panther), Wesa (snake), Mikakh (star), Mi (sun), Tukhe (reddish yellow buffalo), Wakanta (thunder-being), Ke (turtle), Nikiatu (meaning unknown), Tizhu (meaning unknown), Makhe (upper world). Other subdivisions are: Grands Akansas, Epiminguia, Ozark, Petits Acansas, and possibly the Casqui.

The Quapaw participated in the following treaties with the United States: St Louis, Aug. 24, 1818; Harrington's, Ark., Aug. 15, 1824; at an unnamed locality, May 13, 1833; Camp Holmes, Ind. Ter., Aug. 24, 1835; Washington, Feb. 23, 1867.

The Quapaw villages were Imaha, Tongigua, Tourima, Ukakhpakhti, and Uzu-tiuihi, but it is probable that Imaha and Tourima were identical. (C. T.)

Quarai. A former pueblo of the Tigua, about 30 m. E. of the Rio Grande in an air line, in the E. part of Valencia co., N. Mex. At the time of its occupancy it was the southernmost Tigua pueblo of the Salinas region. Quarai was the seat of a Spanish mission from 1629, and contained a monastery and a church dedicated to the Immaculate Conception, the walls of which are still standing. According to Vetancurt, Quarai had 600 inhabitants immediately prior to its abandonment. Between 1664 and 1669 the people of this pueblo connived with the Apache, during a moment of friendliness of the latter, to rout the Spaniards, but the plot was discovered and the leader executed. About 1674 the Apache compelled the Quarai people to flee to Tajique, 12 m. northward. The latter village remained inhabited probably a year longer, when its occupants were also forced to succumb to the persistent hostility of the Apache, and to flee to El Paso, Texas, being afterward settled in the village of Isleta del Sur, farther down the Rio Grande, where their descendants, almost completely Mexicanized, now reside. Quartelejo. An outpost mentioned in Spanish documents of the 17th and 18th centuries as situated on the buffalo plains, N. E. of New Mexico, at which dwelt a band of Jicarilla Apache. A part of the Taos Indians of New Mexico emigrated there in the middle of the 17th century, but were later brought back; and in 1704 the Picuris Indians fled there on account of some superstition, remaining two years. In 1900 Williston and Martin excavated a typical pueblo ruin in Beaver cr. valley, Scott co., Kans., which may have been the site of the Quartelejo. The band of Jicarillas formerly settled in this neighborhood were usually called Apaches de Quartelejo, or de Cuartelejo. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Quartz. A widely distributed mineral, very generally white or whitish in color, and having a glassy fracture. It is the hardest of the common minerals, is infusible under the blowpipe, and resists all acids except hydrofluoric. It was in very general use by the aborigines. Quartz crystals—transparent, smoky, amethystine, etc.—were sometimes employed unmodified as ornaments, or as fetishes and charms, and the larger crystals were utilized in some sections in the manufacture of arrowheads, knives, and ornaments. White vein quartz occurs very generally along the Appalachian highland, where it was obtained from outcropping veins or from the surface, where weathered out and broken into fragments. Pebbles and boulders, which occur plentifully in river and shore deposits, were also much used. Choice pieces were in somewhat rare cases employed in the manufacture of polished objects, as bannerstones, plummets, chunky disks, etc., in which the beauty of the stone was an important consideration. Popularly, white quartz is often erroneously called flint. See Flint, Chalcedony, Quartzite. (W. H. H.)

Quartzite. A metamorphosed sandstone in which, although often quite glassy, the granular structure is still traceable. Its appearance is usually described as saccharoidal—that is, resembling sugar in its crystallized state. Its color varies greatly, brownish and purplish gray varieties prevailing. It occurs in massive strata in many parts of the country, and on account of its great hardness and toughness is a prominent constituent of river, beach, and glacial gravels and boulder beds. It was extensively employed by the native tribes of the N., as it is sufficiently brittle to be flaked into desired implement forms and yet very generally so tough and heavy as to be used for sledges, hammers, axes, picks, chisels, chunky disks, etc. In the suburbs of Washington, D. C., there are extensive ancient quarries where Cretaceous boulder beds made up chiefly of this material were worked by the prehistoric aborigines, the product of the flaking shops which surround the quarries being principally a leaf-shaped blade suited for specializing into knives, spear and arrow points, drills, and scrapers (Holmes in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 1897). In Converse co., Wyo., there are extensive quarries where massive outcrops of Cretaceous quartzite were worked by the native tribes, and numerous flaking shops where the manufacture of implements was carried on (Dorsey in Pub. 51, Field Colum. Mus., 1900). (W. H. H.)

Quasky. A name of the blueback, or oquassa trout (Salmo oquassa): derived from the Algonquian appellation of Oquassa or Oquassac lake, Me., where this fish is found. (A. F. C.)

Quasquen. An unidentified tribe, possibly the Kaskaskia, living formerly beside the Shawnee and Delawares on a branch of the Ohio r. and with them in alliance with the Seneca. — Iberville (ca. 1702) in Margry, Déc., iv, 544, 1880.

Quatsino (Guáts'énôx, 'people of the north country'). A Kwakiutl tribe living at the entrance of the sound of the same name at the n. end of Vancouver id., Brit. Col. Their gentes are Hamanao and Quatsino (or Guatsenok). Their principal winter village in 1885 was Owiye-kumi, and another called Tenate was occupied in summer. Pop. 22 in 1909. (J. R. S.)

Quawqualalp. A Cowichan town on lower Fraser r., opposite Yale, Brit. Col. — Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872.

Queeah. Given in John Work's list (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 489, 1885) as the name of a Haida town of 20 houses with 308 inhabitants in 1836-41. It was perhaps Ninstints (q. v.), which was on an island, Queeah being merely Guai-a, 'it is an island.' (J. R. S.)

Queelquelu. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871) as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598.

Queen Anne. The name given by the English to the woman chief of the Pamunkey tribe (q. v.) of Virginia from about 1675 to 1715 or later. She was the widow of Totopotomoi (q. v.), chief of the tribe, who lost his life in the English service while aiding in repelling an invasion by the wilder inland tribes. She first appears prominently in connection with Bacon's rebellion in 1675, when the colonial government called on her for a contingent of men to cooperate with the governor's forces. She appeared at the council in Indian costume, accompanied by her son, and with dramatic expression of grief and scorn, rejected the proposal on the ground that for 20 years no reward but neglect had been meted out to her or her people for the death of her husband and his warriors. On promise of better treatment she finally consented to furnish the aid required. It was probably in return for her help on this occasion that she received from Charles II the silver headpiece, or "crown," inscribed to the "Queen of Pamunkey," now in possession of the Society for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, at Richmond. Her last appearance in history seems to have been in 1715 as a petitioner on behalf of her oppressed people. (J. M.)

Queenashawakee. A Delaware village on upper Susquehanna r., Pa., about 1758. According to Gerard (inf'n, 1908) the forms of the name as recorded are abortive attempts to write from memory the word Kwinishúkúnehäki, 'panther land (or country).'

Queptahua. A former Diegueño village near the headwaters of San Diego r., San Diego co., Cal. — Sanchez (1821) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., ii, 442, 1886.

Querecho. A Pueblo name for the buffalo-hunting Apache of the plains of E. New Mexico and w. Texas, first encountered by Coronado's expedition in 1541 on its journey to Quivira. They were described as enemies of the Teyas, another hunting tribe of the plains, and were well built and painted; they lived in buffalo-skin tipis, used dogs and travaux for transporting their effects, and subsisted entirely on the buffalo, of which they killed all they wished, "and tan the hides, with which they clothe themselves and make their tents, and they eat the flesh, sometimes raw, and they also even eat the blood when thirsty." Bandelier identifies the Querecho with the Kirauash, or Q'irauash, the Keresan name of a wild tribe which had destroyed the Tano villages s. of Santa Fé, N. Mex., and also threatened the pueblos of Santo Domingo and Pecos in pre-Spanish time. In this connection Hodge has determined that the Pecos name for the Navaho is Keretsá, and for the Apache Tagukerésh.

The Querecho were therefore most likely the plains Apache, later known by the names Mescaleros, Jicarillas, Faraones, Llaneros, etc.; in short, all the Apache who subsisted on the bison, excepting possibly the Kiowa Apache. (F. W. H.)

Queres. See Keresan Family.

Qusal. An unidentified tribe or sub-tribe some of whose members were living in 1706-07 in Coahuila, Mexico, near the Rio Grande, at San Francisco Solano and Nadadores missions. One of those at the former mission was married to a Tepehuane, q. v. (Valero Bautismos, entries for 1706 and 1707, MS.). (H. E. B.)

Qusal.—Valero Bautismos, 1707, op. cit.

Quesinillo. A former Luisiño village near Las Flores, San Diego co., Cal.—Grijalva (1795) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 563, 1886.

Quet. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Quguas. A native village, probably Shoshonean, formerly situated not far from the headwaters of San Luis Rey r., San Diego co., Cal.—Grijalva (1795) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 563, 1886.

Quialpo. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871) as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598. Compare Quiápo.

Quiana. Given by De l'Isle as one of the Hopi pueblos of Arizona, and mentioned also as such by Villa-Señor. The name is not identifiable with that of any former or present pueblo of the Hopi.

Quiana.—De l'Isle, Carte Mexique et Floride, 1703. Quianna.—Villa-Señor, Theatro Am., ii, 425, 1748.

Quickhatch (also quickehatch, quiquihatch, queequhatch). A name, first mentioned by Ellis in 1748, applied by the English residents of the Hudson Bay country to the wolverene, Gulo luscus. The word is from Cree kwikkwadhakets = Prairie Cree kikkwadhakes = (minus the derogative suffix -s or -sh) Chippewa qwingu'dage, the 'scathless' or 'invulnerable' beast; from the root kwikkw, kikkw, 'to be just grazed', but not hit, by a blow or shot aimed at; 'hard to hit' would be a concise interpretation. (W. R. G.)

Quide. One of 36 tribes, friends of the Jumano, said by Juan Sabeata (q. v.) in 1683 to have lived in the present Texas, three days' travel e. of the mouth of the Conchos, and to have desired missionaries.—Mendoza (1683-84), MS. in Archivo Gen., Mex. (H. E. B.)

Quigalta. An Indian province of which De Soto's army first heard while at Anilco, the Anicoyanque of Biedma. The army journeyed thence to Guachoya, on the Mississippi, where it arrived Apr. 17, 1541. From there messengers were sent to the cacique of Quigalta, 3 days' journey s., probably in n. w. Mississippi. There is reason for believing that this may have been the Natchez.

Quigyuma. A Yuman tribe, which, with the Cajuenche, spoke a dialect close to that of the Yuma proper. In 1604-05 they occupied 6 rancherias on the Rio Colorado below the mouth of the Gila and above the Cocopa; in 1762 (Rudo Ensayo, Guiteras trans., 131, 1894) they dwelt in a fertile plain, 10 or 12 leagues in length, on the E. bank of the Colorado, and here they were found by Father Garcés in 1771 in a group of rancherias which he named Santa Rosa. By 1775, however, when Garcés revisited the tribe, which he designates as the "Quiquima or Jalliquamay," they had moved to the w. side of the river. Their first rancherias on the N. were in the vicinity of Ogden's landing, about lat. 32° 18', where they met the Cajuenche. On the s. their territory bordered that of their kindred, but enemies, the Cocopa. The Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1762) mentions them as the most populous tribe on the river. Garcés (1775) estimated their number at 2,000, and described them as being a generous people, with abundant provisions; they were more cleanly than the Cajuenche or the Yuma, "and as the women do not paint so much, they appear middling white" (Diary, 1775, 181, 1900). It is possible that the Quigyuma were finally absorbed by the Cocopa or by some other Yuman tribe. Their rancherias, so far as recorded, were Presentacion, San Casimiro, San Felix de Valois, San Rudesindo, and Santa Rosa. (F. W. H.)

Quileute. A Chimakuan tribe, now the only representative of the linguistic stock, whose main seat is at Lapush, at the mouth of Quillayute r., about 35 m. s. of C. Flattery, w. coast of Washington. A small division of the tribe, the Hoh, live at the mouth of the river of the same name, 15 m. s. of Lapush. Since they have been known to the whites the Quileute have always been few in number, but being of an independent and warlike disposition and occupying an easily defended situation, they have successfully resisted all the attempts of neighboring tribes to dislodge them. Their most active enemies have been the Makah, of Neah bay, and until they came under the control of the United States petty warfare between the two tribes was constant. The Quileute are noted for their skill in pelagic sealing and are the most successful in that pursuit of all the tribes of the coast. They are also daring whalers, but have not attained the proficiency of the Makah. Salmon are caught in considerable numbers and constitute an important article of food. Roots and berries of various kinds are also much used. Although the woods in their vicinity abound with deer, elk, and bear, the Quileute seem to have hunted them but little and have confined themselves to a seafaring life. There is evidence that a clan system of some sort formerly existed among them, but is now broken down. Their customs as well as their mythology indicate a possible connection with the tribes of Vancouver id. The Quileute, together with the Quinaielt, by treaty at

Olympia, July 1, 1855, and Jan. 25, 1856, ceded all their lands to the United States and agreed to remove to a reserve to be provided for them in Washington Ter. The tribe has gradually diminished until now it numbers but slightly more than 200. They are under the jurisdiction of the Neah Bay agency. (L. F.)

Quillwork. Embroidery worked with quills of the porcupine or sometimes with those of bird feathers. The two kinds of embroidery bear a superficial resemblance. In both cases the stiffness of the quill limits freedom of design, making necessary straight lines and angular figures.

The gathering of the raw materials, the hunting of porcupines or the capture of birds, was the task of the men, who also in some tribes prepared the dyes. Sorting and coloring the quills, tracing the design on dressed skin or birchbark, and the embroidering were exclusively the work of women.

In sorting porcupine quills the longest and the finest were first selected and laid in separate receptacles. Another selection was made, and the long or fine quills of the second quality were laid away. The remaining quills were kept for common work. Bladders of the elk or buffalo served as quill cases. The dyes, which varied in different parts of the country, were compounded variously of roots, whole plants, and buds and bark of trees. The quills were usually steeped in concoctions of these until a uniform color was obtained—red, yellow, green, blue, or black. No variegated hues were made, and rarely more than one shade of a color. The natural color of whitish quills afforded a white, and sometimes those of a brownish cast were used. The quills of feathers were split, except the fine pliant tips. The porcupine quills were not split, nor were they used in the round state. They were always flattened. This was done by holding one end firmly between the teeth, pressing the edge of the thumbnail against the quill held by the forefinger, and drawing it tightly along the length of the quill, the process being repeated until the quill became smooth and flat. This flattening process was never done until the quill was required for immediate use. It was not uncommon for a woman to have in her workbag several patterns drawn on bits of skin, bark, or paper, cut through to make a stencil. These patterns were stenciled or drawn with a bone paint-brush, a stick, or a dull knife, on the skin or bark that was to be worked. A woman who was skilled in or had a natural gift for drawing would copy a design by the free-hand method, except that she had first made some measurements in order that the pattern should be in its proper place and proportions. Some even composed designs, both the forms and arrangement of colors, and worked them out as they embroidered. Among most tribes the awl was the only instrument used in quill-working. The Cheyenne, Arapaho, and Sioux, the principal quill-working tribes, had a specially shaped bone for flattening, bending, and smoothing (Mooney). A small hole was made with it in the skin or bark, through which the sharp point of the quill was thrust from the back and drawn out on the front side. An end of the flattened quill was left at the back, and this was bent and pressed close to the skin or bark to serve as a fastening, like a knot on a thread. Another hole was made, perpendicular to the first, and through this the quill was passed to the back, thus making the stitch. The distance between the holes determined not only the length of the stitches, but also the width of the lines forming the design. All designs in quillwork were made up of wide or narrow lines, each composed of a series of upright stitches lying close together. As quills were always so short that one could make only a few stitches at most, the fastening of ends and uniformity in the length of stitches were important points in the technic of the work. The width of the lines varied from a sixteenth to a quarter of an inch. Very rarely was more than one width employed in one design. The banded fringe usually attached to the border of tobacco-bags was made on strips of dressed skin, cut in the desired width, around which flattened quills were closely and evenly bound, care being taken to conceal the ends of the quills in order that the binding, even when various colors were used to form the design, might look as though it was one band. Different colors on the different strands of the fringe were so arranged that when the strands hung in place the meeting of the colors made the figure.

The stems of pipes were decorated with fine flattened quills, closely woven into a long and very narrow braid, which was wound about the wooden stem. Different colors were sometimes so disposed along the length of these braids that when they were wound around the stem they made squares or other figures. Careful calculations as well as deftness of finger were required for this style of work.

Porcupine quills were employed for embroidery from Maine to Virginia and w. to the Rocky mts. n. of the Arkansas r. On the N. W. coast they were used by tribes which had come in contact with the Athapascans. So far as known, this style of work was not practised by the tribes of California, nor by those of the southern plains, as the Kiowa, Comanche, Apache, and Wichita, the porcupine not being found in their country. Quills seem to have been an article of barter; hence their use was not confined to regions where the animal abounded. This style of decoration was generally put on tobacco and tinder bags, workbags, knife and paint-stick cases, cradles, amulets, the bands of burden-straps, tunics, shirts, leggings, belts, arm and leg bands, moccasins, robes, and sometimes on the trappings of horses. All such objects were of dressed skin. Receptacles and other articles made of birch-bark also were frequently embroidered with quills.

Nearly every tribe has its peculiar cut for moccasins, often also its special style of ornamentation, and these were carefully observed by the workers. The dress of the men was more ornate than that of the women, and the decorations the women put on the former were generally related to man's employments—hunting and war. The figures were frequently designed by the men, and a man very often designated what particular figure he desired a woman to embroider on his garment. Some designs belonged exclusively to women; there were, moreover, some that were common to both sexes. The decorative figures worked on the garments of children not infrequently expressed prayers for safety, long life, and prosperity, and usually were symbolic. There was considerable borrowing of designs by the women through the medium of gifts exchanged between tribes during ceremonial observances or visits, and thus figures that were sacred symbols in some tribes came to be used merely as ornaments by others. Some of the designs in quillwork were undoubtedly originated by men, while others were invented by women. These were frequently credited to dreams sent by the spider, who, according to certain tribal mythic traditions, was the instructor of women in the art of embroidery.

Technical skill as well as unlimited patience was required to make even, smooth, and fine porcupine quillwork, and proficiency could be acquired only by practice and nice attention to details. The art seems to have reached its highest development among those tribes to whose territory the porcupine was native, and especially among those which had an abundant food supply and whose men were the principal providers—conditions that made it possible for the women to have the leisure necessary for them to become adept in the working of quills. This art, which formerly flourished over a wide area, is rapidly dying out. It is doubtful whether any woman at the present day could duplicate the fine embroidery of a hundred years ago. The use of the split quills of bird-feathers for embroidery was common among the Alaskan Eskimo, and was also practised by some other tribes.

The hair of animals was sometimes combined with the quills in forming the figures. The northern Algonquian tribes, as well as the Eskimo of Alaska and of N. E. Siberia, employed the hair of the moose, its pliancy permitting freedom of design, while its texture seems to make it susceptible of taking delicate hues in dyeing; undyed hair was used to blend the colors and to outline the curved, flowing lines of the figures. A few examples of this beautiful aboriginal work are preserved in museums. (A. C. F.)

Quilmur. A tribe hostile to the Alchedoma, the border of whose territory was visited by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1774, when he explored the valleys of the Gila and the Colorado, in Arizona. They were apparently N. of the Alchedoma, and from their locality might possibly be the Mohave. See Garcés, Diary (1774), 45, 1900; Bancroft, Ariz. and N. M., 390, 1889. Cf. Gueymura.

Quinaielt. A Salish tribe on Quinaielt r., Wash., and along the coast between the Quilente and the Quaitso on the N. (the latter of which probably formed a part of the tribe), and the Chehalis on the S. Lewis and Clark described them in two divisions, the Calasthocle and the Quiniilt, with 200 and 1,000 population, respectively. In 1909 they numbered 156, under the Puyallup school superintendency.

Quinebaug. The chief Quinebaug village, situated near Plainfield, Windham co., Conn. According to De Forest, there were 25 Indians, probably the remnant of the band, at Plainfield in 1774.

Quinequann. See Quinney.

Quinet. A tribe living near Matagorda bay, Texas, with whom La Salle made peace in Jan. 1687, as he was leaving that region for the Mississippi. The Quinet were living in what was then Karankawan territory and were at war with the Quoaquis, or Coasque (Hennepin, New Discov., 30, 1698; Shea, Early Voy., 21, 1861).

Quinnapi (probably an abbreviation of kinnapiñom, 'he turns (something) around.'—Gerard). A chief of the Narraganset, nephew of Miantonomo. He sided with his brother-in-law, King Philip, in the war of 1675, and was present at the attack on Lancaster. The next year he was captured by the English, tried by court-martial at Newport, R. I., sentenced to death, and shot. Quinnapi was the Indian who purchased Mrs Rowlandson from her captor at the taking of Lancaster. Her narrative contains interesting information about him. (A. F. C.)

Quinnat. An economically important species of salmon (Salmo quinnat) of the Pacific coast of North America: the common salmon of the Columbia, known also as tyeo salmon, Chinook salmon, etc. From Quinnat, the name of this fish in Salishan dialects current in the Columbia r. region. According to Boas, the Upper Chinook form is qñat. (A. F. C.)

Quinney, John. An Indian of the Mohegan or Stockbridge tribe, who lived about the middle of the 18th century. He was probably an assistant or interpreter to the Rev. John Sergeant the elder, missionary at Stockbridge, Mass., from 1735 to 1749, whom he aided in translating into Mohegan various prayers and other works, including the Assembly's Catechism, printed at Stockbridge in 1795. Nothing is known of his personal history; but his descendants were prominent in the later history of the tribe.

His son, JOSEPH QUINNEY, whose name is also spelled Quanaukaunt and Quinequaun, was town constable of Stockbridge in 1765; and in 1777, after the death of the sachem Solomon Unhaunnaunwaunutt, was made chief of the Mohegan tribe. Another JOSEPH QUINNEY, perhaps a son, was chosen deacon of the new Stockbridge (N. Y.) church in 1817, and in the following year was one of the leaders in the emigration of his people from the State of New York to their new home in the W.

Quinney, John W. A Stockbridge Indian of the early half of the 19th century, born in 1797, and chief of the tribe in Wisconsin for three years previous to his death, July 21, 1855. When a boy he was one of three who received a common English education under the patronage of the United States, being placed under the tuition of Caleb Underhill, of Westchester, N. Y., where he pursued his studies with alacrity and proficiency. By degrees he gained the confidence of his people, until almost the entire tribal business was intrusted to him. In 1822, he, with two others, formed a deputation to Green Bay, Wis., where a treaty was made and concluded with the Menominee, by which was purchased all the Green Bay lands designed for the future home of the New York Indians. In 1825 he procured the passage of a law by the New York legislature granting the Stockbridge tribe full value for the New York lands, thus enabling them subsequently to remove to Green Bay. The lands of the New York Indians purchased from the Menominee being endangered by a repurchase made by United States officers, Quinney was sent in 1828 to petition Congress, in behalf of the united New York tribes, for the recognition of their landed rights. In this, however, he failed, and the Stockbridge tribe lost their home at Kaukana, Fox r., but the Government allowed them $25,000 for their improvements. Quinney next entered at once into a new plan, and finally, after protracted efforts, he obtained, in 1832, the grant of two townships on the E. side of L. Winnebago, Wis., where the tribe still resides. About the year 1833 Quinney framed a constitution, as the basis of a tribal government, which was adopted by his people and led to the abandonment of hereditary chieftainship. In 1846 he effected the repeal of an act of Congress of 1843 which made citizens of his tribesmen, thus permitting his people to enjoy their own customs and government; he also obtained for them $5,000 on account of their old claims. The tribe made a treaty in 1843, in concluding which Quinney took a prominent part, the Government agreeing to find the tribe a new home W. of the Mississippi, and to remove them thither; but after many unsuccessful attempts on their part to select the lands and remove, in which Quinney engaged with untiring zeal, he finally conceived the plan of reacquiring the township of Stockbridge. Efforts immediately commenced finally terminated in the ratification of a new treaty by which the Government receded to the tribe its old home. In 1854, Quinney succeeded in obtaining the passage of a law by Congress which granted to him the title to 460 acres in Stockbridge. At the election held in 1852, he was chosen grand sachem of the tribe, which office he filled honorably until his death, encouraging everything calculated to improve his people (Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., iv, 309-311, 1859).

The prominence of the Quinney family in the history of the Stockbridge tribe is shown by the presence of from one to three of the family names signed to every treaty made by these Indians with the United States from Oct. 27, 1832, to Feb. 5, 1856.

Quinnipiac ('long-water people.'—Gerard). A tribe formerly occupying the country on both sides of Quinnipiac r. about its mouth, in New Haven co., Conn. Their principal village bore the same name. Rutenber makes them a part of the Wappinger group and subject to the Mattabesec, while Gookin says they were subject to the Pequot. De Forest includes in this tribe the Guilford Indians as well as those of New Haven, East Haven, and Branford. The Hammonasset might also be included. They were estimated in 1730 at 250 to 300 persons. In 1638 they numbered 47 warriors, but in 1774 there were only 38 souls. Some of them had removed in 1768 to Farmington, where land was bought for them among the Tunxi. Some Quinnipiac graves have been examined, in which skeletons were found at the depth of 3½ ft, stretched on bare sandstone with no indication of wrappings or inclosures. For an account of the labors of the Rev. Abraham Pierson at Branford and of his translations into the Quiripi, or Quinnipiak, language of various works for the use of the Indians, see Pilling, *Bibliog. Algonq. Quinnipiac. The principal village of the Quinnipiac, occupying the site of New Haven, Conn. For details of its situation and history, see Townshend, Quinnipiak Inds., 1900.

Quioborique. One of 36 tribes reported in 1683 as living in Texas, 3 days' travel N. E. of the mouth of the Rio Conchos. This information was given to Domingo de Mendoza by his Jumano guide, Juan Sabeata (Mendoza, Viage, 1683-84, MS. in Archivo General of Mexico). (H. E. B.)

Quiomaquí. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871) as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), in the region of the Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598.

Quiotráco. A pueblo of the Tigua or the Tewa in New Mexico in 1598 (Oñate in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 116, 1871). Bandelier (Ritch, New Mexico, 201, 1885) identifies it with ruins in Rio Arriba co., and it appears to be identical with Quioyaco, mentioned by Oñate (op. cit., 102) as a Chigua (Tigua) pueblo.

Quioucohanock ('gull river people.'—Gerard). A former tribe of the Powhatan confederacy on the s. bank of James r. in Surry co., Va. They numbered about 125 in 1608.

Quioughcohanock was understood to be the name of two streams about 11 m. apart, afterward called Upper and Lower Chipoak creeks. The name of the people was understood by the settlers of Jamestown to be Tapahanock, 'people of the stream that ebbs and flows'—a characteristic of all creeks of tidewater Virginia, which depend for their water on the tides of the rivers into which they flow, and not on the drainage of the surrounding land. Their chief town and residence of the werowance was probably upon an eminence now called Wharf Bluff, just E. of Upper Chipoak cr., in Surry co. It was visited, May 5, 1607, by Capt. Archer, who gives an entertaining account of the werowance of the country. (W. R. G.)

Quioucohanock. The chief village of the Quioucohanock (q. v.).

Coiacohanauke.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 56, 1849. Quiyonghcohanock.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819 (misprint). Tapahanock.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 56, 1849 (commonly, but corruptly, so called by the English).

Quiquiborica. A former rancheria, probably of the Sobaipuri, visited by Kino and Mange in 1699 (Mange cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889). Situated on the Rio Santa Cruz, 6 leagues s. of Guevavi (q. v.), near the Arizona-Sonora boundary. Probably the later Buenavista. See Bacuanacos.

Quiquihatch. See Quickhatch.

Quirogles. A former Costanoan village on or near San Francisco bay, Cal.

Quirogles.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Quirotas.—Humboldt, New Spain, I, 821, 1811.

Quisabas. A tribe mentioned in 1684 by Domingo de Mendoza (Viage, 1683-84, MS. in Archivo Gen.) among those he expected to see in central Texas.

Quisaht (prob. 'people on the other side'). A name given to the Nootka settlements "beyond the Yuclulaht" (Ucluellet).—Sproat, Savage Life, 303, 1868.

Quiscat. The name of a chief of the lower Tawakoni village, and of the village itself, in the latter part of the 18th century. The settlement was on the w. side of the Brazos, on a bluff or plateau above some springs, not far from modern Waco, Texas. In 1778, immediately after an epidemic, it contained 150 warriors, or about 750 people (Mezières in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 273, MS.). In 1779, Mezières, while at the village, called it the "first village of the Taucanas, named that of Quiscat" (Noticia de los Efectos, etc., Sept. 13, 1779, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 248, MS.). Morfi erroneously says that this village was one of Kichai and Yscani (Hist. Tex., ca. 1781, MS.). The name El Quiscat was applied to the village as late as 1795 (Manuel Muñoz in Lamar Papers, Mar. 13, 1795, MS.). Chief Quiscat went to San Antonio with Mezières to make peace with the Spaniards, apparently in 1772, and remained there after generally friendly, particularly using his influence to aid the Spaniards in restoring the apostate Aranames to Espíritu Santo mission, and inducing the Tonkawa to settle in a permanent village (Vial, Diario, 1787, in Archivo Gen., Hist., xliii, MS.). Pedro Vial, when on his expedition from San Antonio to Santa Fé, having been severely injured by a fall from his horse, stayed three weeks at the lodge of Chief "Quiscate" to recover. See Flechasos. For the name, cf. Kishkat, given as a Wichita subtribe. (H. E. B.)

Quiscat.—Morfi, MS. Hist. Tex., II, ca. 1781. Quiscat.—Mezières (1779), op. cit. Quiscate.—Vial (1787), op. cit. Quisquate.—Ibid.

Quisiyove. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570.

Luiseyove.—Fontaneda as quoted by French, Hist. Coll. La., 2d s., II, 255, 1875 (misprint).

Quiseyove.—Fontaneda as quoted by Ternaux-Compans, Voy., xx, 22, 1841. Quisiyove.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1854.

Quitacas. One of the tribes the members of which accompanied Domingo de Mendoza on his expedition from the middle Rio Grande to the interior of Texas in 1683-84.—Mendoza, Viage (1683-84), MS. in Archivo Gen. Mexico. (H. E. B.)

Quitamac. A ruined pueblo of the Opata about 12 m. s. e. of Baserac, on the headwaters of Rio Yaqui, lat. 30°, e. Sonora, Mexico.

Quit-a-mac.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 62, 1890; IV, 517, 1892.

Quitoles. A tribe mentioned by Cabeza de Vaca (Smith trans., 84, 1851) as dwelling on the coast during his sojourn in Texas in 1527-34. The locality given is indefinite, and the ethnic relations of the tribe can not be determined with certainty, but they were probably Karankawan or Coahuiltecan. Cf. Guisoles.

Quitoks.—Cabeza de Vaca, Smith trans., 137, 1871.

Quitovaquita. The westernmost Papago village, situated on the headwaters of Rio Salado of Sonora, near the Arizona-Sonora boundary, lon. 112° 40'. Pop. 250 in 1863, 314 in 1900.

Quitobaca.—Garcés, Diary (1775-6), 487, 1900 (here confused with Bacapa).

Quito Vaqueta.—Browne, Apache Country, 291, 1869. Quitovaquita.—Poston in Ind. Aff. Rep. for 1863, 385, 1864.

Quittaub. A village having some Praying Indians in 1698, apparently in s. w. Plymouth co., Mass. It may have been subject to the Wampanoag. See Rawson and Danforth (1698) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 129, 1809.

Quiubaco. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871) as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy, in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598. Possibly an attempt at Shiewibak, the native name of Isleta pueblo.

Quiutcanuaha. An unidentified tribe mentioned by Jesus María (Relación, Aug. 15, 1691, folio 112, MS.) as among the "Texias," or allies of the Hasinai of Texas. He said that they were s. w. of the Nabadache, and named them with Vidix (Bidai?), Toaha, Cantouhaona, Mepayaya, and others. They evidently lived between Trinity and San Antonio rs. (H. E. B.)

Quivers. See Arrows, Receptacles.

Quivi. An unidentified tribe mentioned by Morfi in his list of Texas tribes (MS. Hist. Tex., bk. II, ca. 1781).

Quiviquinta. A Tepehuane pueblo in n. Jalisco, Mexico, 38 m. n. w. of Jesus María, and about 40 m. s. w. of Lajas.

Quiaviquinta.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 281, 1864.

Quivira (possibly a Spanish corruption of Kidikwius, or Kirikurus, the Wichita name for themselves, or of Kirikuraks, the Pawnee name for the Wichita). An Indian "province" of which Coronado learned from an Indian of the plains, evidently a Pawnee, known as "The Turk," while on the Rio Grande among the Pueblos of New Mexico in 1540-41. Quivira being reported as populous and of great wealth, Coronado started with his army, in the spring of 1541, to find it, with The Turk as a guide; but the Spaniards finding they were being misled by the Indian, who hoped to lose them on the great plains and cause them to perish. The Turk was put in irons, the main force sent back from the upper waters of the Rio Colorado of Texas, where they then were, and another Indian, Yaopete, chosen as guide for the rest of the journey due w. to Quivira, of which province he was a native. Proceeding northward for about thirty days with 30 picked horsemen, Coronado reached a river, which he called SS. Peter and Paul (identified as the Arkansas), the last of June, and proceeded up its w. bank within the present Kansas. This was the beginning of the Quivira country. The surrounding region was traversed during the remainder of the summer, but great disappointment met the Spaniards at the finding of only villages of grass lodges occupied by a semi-agricultural tribe, identified as the Wichita. The Turk was strangled to death as a punishment for his deception. An invitation was sent to the chief, Tatarax, of the neighboring province of Harahey, believed to have been the Pawnee country, and every effort was made by the Spaniards to find traces of the gold in which the region was reputed to abound, but of course without result. The explorers returned to the Rio Grande by a more direct route, evidently following, from the Arkansas r., what later became the Santa Fé trail. Coronado continued to Mexico with his army in 1542, leaving behind Fray Juan de Padilla, who returned to Quivira, but was murdered by the natives because he planned to leave them and minister to another tribe. The name Quivira soon appeared on the maps of the period, but by reason of the indefiniteness of the knowledge of its situation the locality shifted from the region of the Great Plains to the Pacific coast, and finally settled, in the form La Gran Quivira, at the ruins of the forgotten Piro settlement of Tabira, s. of the Rio Grande in New Mexico, at which a Franciscan mission was established in 1629.

Quashair ('pleasant place'). An inhabited Niska village of 5 old-fashioned houses with totem-poles in front; situated on a gravel flat at the edge of the woods, on the s. bank of Nam r., Brit. Col., just below the canyon. In 1906 the inhabitants were about to leave it and to settle several miles above, at the lower end of the canyon. (G. T. H.)

Quannona. See Channonia.

Quoddy. A variety of large herring found in Passamaquoddy bay, Me. From the place and ethnic name Passamaquoddy, Peakidmakaddi, according to Gatachet (Nat. Geog. Mag., viii, 23, 1897), which signifies 'abundance of pollock' in the Passamaquoddy dialect. The truncated form Quoddy appears also in place nomenclature. There are also "quoddy boats" in this region. (A. F. C.)

Quatta. See Chukry.

Quoratan Family. A term derived from Kworatan, the Yurok name of a small area of flat land at the confluence of Klamath and Salmon rs., just below the mouth of the latter, n. w. Cal. This name, proposed by Gibbs (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 422, 1853), was adopted by Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 100, 1891) for the linguistic family consisting of the Karok (q. v.) tribe or group.

Quotough. A village situated in 1608 on the w. bank of Patuxent r., in Prince George co., Md.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Qyan. The name of a place at the n. point of Gray's harbor, coast of Washington (Gairdner, 1835, in Jour. Geog. Soc. Lond., xi, 255, 1841). Unidentified.

Rababou. See Robbiboe.

Rabbit Assiniboin. A small band of Assiniboin living in 1829 in Assiniboia, Canada, w. of the Red River band.—Henry, Jour., ii, 522, 1897.

Rabbit Lake Chippewa. A Chippewa band on Rabbit lake, Minn.—Washington treaty (1863) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 215, 1873.

Rabbit stick. The flat, curved rabbit club, púshkohu of the Hopi, often called a boomerang, is not self-retrieving like the Australian weapon, though it shares the aeroplane nature of the latter; it is similar in form, but has not the delicate curves shaped to cause a return flight. Not all the Australian aeroplane clubs, however, are self-retrieving, a property probably discovered through practise with sailing clubs. The Hopi rabbit stick is delivered in the same way as the Australian, and its course after it strikes the ground often brings it to the right or left of the thrower and nearer to him than the farthest point reached in its flight. It makes one or more revolutions in its flight toward a rabbit, and if it does not strike the animal directly, its rapid gyration when it touches the ground makes probable the hitting of any object within several feet. So far as is known this is the only aeroplane club used in America. The material is Gambell's oak (Quercus gambelii), and a branch of the proper curve is selected for its manufacture. One end is cut out to form a handle, and the club is usually varnished with resin and painted with an invariable design in black, red, and green. Of late years a rabbit figure is frequently painted thereon. The weapon has a religious significance, probably arising from its use in ceremonial rabbit hunts, and it is the symbol of the sacred dance personage named Makto, 'hunt.'

The Gabrieleños of s. California used a rabbit stick similar to that of the Hopi; it was 2 ft in length in a straight line, 1½ in. across at the handle, and 1½ in. across at the broadest part, with an average thickness of ¾ in. It was made of hard wood, and ornamented with markings burnt in the surface.

Rabbit Trap. A Cherokee settlement in upper Georgia about the time of the removal of the tribe to the W. in 1839.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Raccoon. A well-known quadruped, Procyon lotor, of the Ursidae, or bear family, esteemed alike for its flesh and its pelt, which was one of the skins used by the southern Indians for making their loose winter mantles, or matchcoats. The first mention of the name in a recognizable form, that of arocoun, was made in 1610, and the second, in that of aroughcun, in 1612. The animal, which is nocturnal in its habits, sleeps in the daytime in some hollow tree (the sweet gum, Liquidambar styraciflua, in the S.) during the successive climbings of which to seek its abode the sharp nails with which its forepaws are provided leave long scratches upon the bark. Such a tree is hence called by the Indians by a name signifying 'raccoon tree.' It was from such tree-scratching custom that the animal received from the Virginia Indians the name by which it is universally known to English-speaking people, viz, ärä'kun, an apocopated form of ärä'kunēm, 'he scratches with the hands.' The name is sometimes applied in British Guiana to the coatimondi (Nasua fusca), and, along with its apheretic form of 'coon' (which also is a humorous name for a negro, and in 1844 was a nickname applied to members of the Whig party, that adopted the raccoon as an emblem), enters into several combinations, as, 'raccoon-berry,' the fruit of Podophyllum peltatum and Symphoricarpus racemosus, on which the animal feeds; 'raccoon dog,' a kind of dog (Nyctereutes procyonoides) of Japan and China, and also a dog trained to hunt raccoons; 'raccoon grape,' a species of grape (Vitis æstivalis) of which the animal, and his relative the bear, are very fond; 'raccoon (or coon) oyster,' a small southern variety of the mollusk on which the animal subsists when vegetable food is scarce; 'raccoon perch,' the yellow perch (Perca flavescens), the dark bands upon the sides of which bear a remote resemblance to those of a raccoon's tail; 'coon bear,' a large carnivore of Tibet, and 'coon-heel,' a name in Connecticut for a long, slender oyster. In the Presidential campaign of 1844, 'Coonery' was a derogative synonym for Whiggery or Whiggism, meaning the doctrines of the Whig party. The animal has the reputation of being very knowing; hence the simile 'as sly as a coon,' and the metaphor 'he is an old coon,' said of a person who is very shrewd. Finally, 'to coon' is to creep, cling close, to creep as a coon along a branch; a 'gone coon' is a person whose case is hopeless, and a 'coon's age' is a southern figurative expression meaning a long time; while to be 'as forlorn as an unmated coon' is to be extremely wretched. (W. R. G.)

Race names. The names given to the white man by the various Indian tribes exhibit a wide range of etymological signification, since the newcomers received appellations referring to their personal appearance, arrival in ships, arms, dress, and other accouterments, activities, merchandise and articles brought with them, as iron, and fancied correspondence to figures of aboriginal myth and legend. A few tribes borrowed words to designate the white man, probably before they actually saw him. Some others extended the term at first employed for Englishmen or Frenchmen to include all white men with whom they afterward had to do. In the following examples the native names have been simplified so far as possible.

Algonquian names.—Among the various languages of the Algonquian stock a number of different terms for white man are to be found. The Arapaho has niatha, nanagakanet, nihanatayeche, etc. The last signifies 'yellow hide,' the second 'white-skinned.' Of niatha Mooney (14th Rep. B. A. E., 1020, 1896) says: "The word signifies literally expert, skillful, or wise, and is also the Arapaho name for the spider." Kroeber (Trad. of Arapaho, 8, 1902) says the name is given to the character in Arapaho traditions corresponding to the Algonquian Nanabozho, Napi, etc., and the Siouan Ishtinike, while at the same time it is now "the ordinary word for white men in Arapaho just as in Cheyenne the name of the mythical character Iihho, has been applied to the whites." (See also Wake, Nihancan, the White Man, Am. Antiq., xxvi, 224-31, 1904.) In Siksika a white man is called napiékwan, in which -ekwan is a kind of ethnic suffix of the person. As a general term for 'white man' we have the Chippewa wayabishkirād, 'one who is white' (generally referring to Englishmen only); Miami, wábkēlokēta, 'white skin' (a white man); equally common with these terms for whites in general is misha'kīganāšiwūg, 'they of the hairy chest' (Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906). The former Chippewa term corresponds with the Cree wapiskisiw and related words in cognate dialects. The Delaware woapsit, 'white person,' signifies literally 'he is white.' Delaware also has for 'European' schwonach, 'person from the salt (sea).' The Chippewa term for 'Englishman,' shaganash, has been extended to mean 'white man,' just as has also the Micmac word for 'Frenchman,' wenooch, Penobscot awenoch, Abnaki awanoch, cognate with such other Algonquian terms for 'white man' as the Narraganset awaunagus, Scaticook wanux, Pequot-Mohegan wonnux, Passamaquoddy wenoch, etc., primarily derived from awan, 'who,' 'somebody,' the European being looked upon as 'somebody coming.'

Athapascan names.—According to Morice (Anthropos, i, 236, 1906), the Western Déné call the whites neto, and the French su-neto, i. e. 'the true white men.' The Navaho term for whites is Belagana, a corruption of the Spanish word Americano.

Eskimo names.—The representative Eskimo term for 'white man' is kablunak, according to Rink (Am. Anthr., xi, 181-87, 1898), a corruption by Europeans of keydlunak, 'wolf,' preserved in this sense only in the Eskimo language of the far west, the name having been given with reference to the myth of "the girl and the dogs." Another etymology derives the word from the root qauk, 'daylight,' 'white day,' so that it ultimately signifies 'having very light skin.' Petitot favors a derivation which indicates the European fashion of "wearing a cap or hat covering their foreheads down to the eyebrows (kablut).'' In the secret language of the Central Eskimo medicine-men (Boas in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xv, 35, 1901) the word for 'European' is kidlatet, evidently a derivative of kidlak, the secret term for 'iron.' When the crew of the Plover reached Pt Barrow (Richardson, Polar Reg., 300, 1861), they were termed by the Eskimo shakenatanagmeun, 'people from under the sun,' and emakhlin, 'sea men,' but commonly nelluangmeun, 'unknown people.' The Greenland Eskimo called the Danes utisut, 'winterers.'

Iroquoian names.—The Cherokee, according to Mooney, call the white man yúñwunega, from yúñwi 'person,' and unega 'white.' Cuoq (Lex. Iroq., 112, 1882) gives for 'white man,' kihñaraken, 'my skin is white,' from keraken 'I am white,' and ohna 'skin.' Another Iroquoian term is asseroni, 'he makes axes,' the name applied by the Iroquois to the first Dutch colonists, and in Canada, in the form onseronni, to the French. Other Iroquoian names now or formerly in use are: Wyandot or Caughnawaga tulhaesaga, said to mean 'morning-light people,' and ashalecoa, or assaricol, said to mean 'big knife'; Huron agnonha, 'Frenchman.'

Kiowan names.—A Kiowa term for 'white men' is bedalpago, 'hairy mouths,' from bedal 'lip,' pa 'downy hair,' and go tribal terminal. Another is ta-ka-i, 'ears sticking out,' which, according to Mooney (14th Rep. B. A. E., 1091, 1896) applies to the ears of a white "as compared with the Indian's, which are partly concealed by his long hair." It is also the Kiowa name for a mule or a donkey. Another term is hañpogo, 'trappers,' because some of the first whites known to them were American trappers (Mooney, 17th Rep. B. A. E., 397, 1898). Still other names in use among the Kiowa for white men, according to Mooney, are ganofko, 'growlers,' in allusion to their rougher voices; gasitonto, 'capwearers,' and boyofko, 'blonds.' The word beidal-pago, while designating whites in general, applies more particularly to Americans, who are also known as t'o-ta'ka-i, 'cold whites,' that is, northern white men, as distinguished from the Mexicans to the s. The Texans are distinguished as Tehā'-nego, from the Spanish Tejano.

Kutenai names.—The Kutenai call a white man suyapi, a term identical with sueapo, given by Parker (Jour., 381, 1840) as the Nez Percé word for 'American.' Another Kutenai term is nullukene, 'stranger.' A third expression, kamnuqlo aktmakini, 'white man,' is probably a translation of the English term.

Maidu name.—According to Gatschet the term for white man is sakini, i. e. 'ghosts,' 'spirits'.

Shoshonean names.—In Shoshoni and Comanche the word for 'white man' is tairo; in Paiute and Bannock, tavibo. This, as Mooney (14th Rep. B. A. E., 1056, 1896) has pointed out, seems to be derived from tābi, 'the sun.' The Washo name for 'white man,' tabaa, may have been borrowed from the neighboring Paviotso. The idea of sun men, or easterners, is met with elsewhere, as among the Hopi of Shoshonean stock.

Siouan names.—Long (Exped. Rocky Mts., II, lxxx, 1823) gives the name for 'white man' in Oto as mazonkka, 'iron-makers,' and the Omaha name as wahta, 'makers.' A vocabulary of about 1819 has Omaha wahe, Hidatsa washi, i. e. masi. More modern vocabularies and dictionaries give the following Siouan words for 'whiteman': Dakota, washechu; Mandan, wuashi; Assiniboin, wahsheechoon. These and related words signify 'rich people,' or perhaps 'generous people.' The Hidatsa term (Matthews, Hidatsa Ind., 183, 1877) for 'white' (American) is maetsihateki, or maetsiictia, i. e. 'long or big knife.'

Skittagetan names.—The Skidegate dialect of Haida has for 'white man' kelga-daa, 'man white,' and yets-haidagai, 'iron people,' the latter being the usual term.

Wakashan names.—The Nootka word for 'white man' or 'European,' mamatne, signifies really 'house adrift on water,' in reference to the ships of the newcomers. The word in the Clayoquot dialect is mamatle.

The examples cited show the variety existing in the names for 'white man' among the linguistic stocks n. of Mexico and the interesting ways in which such appellations have been made up from peculiarities of a physical, mental, or social character.

Yuchi name.—The Yuchi term for white man (American) is kuyáχka, from ku 'man,' waχka 'white' (Gatschet).

Muskhogeans name.—The Choctaw term for white man is nanhullo.

Americans.—The American, or inhabitant of the English colonies in what is now the United States, received from the Indians during and after the wars which preceded and followed the Revolution, names which distinguished him from the Frenchman and the Englishman. Probably from the swords of the soldiery several tribes designated Americans as 'big knives,' or 'long knives.' This is the signification of the Chippewa and Nipissing chimo'koman, from kechimo'koman, 'great knife,' Cree kitchimokkuman, Delaware m'chonsikan, 'big knife' (i. e., Virginian), and cognate terms in some of the Algonquian dialects. In Menominee is found mokuman (mo'koman, 'knife'); in Wyandot (1819), saraumigh; in Shawnee, shē-manēsē, 'big knife'; in Oto (1823), mahe-hunjeh; in Omaha (1823), mahhetunguh; in Dakota (1823), menahashah; in Hidatsa (1823), manceecheet. These, like the Yankton minahanska and Teton mila-hanska, signify 'long or big knife.' In 1871 Roehrig gave the Dakota word for 'American' as isangtanka, 'big knife.' The Siksika term omak kistoapikwan signifies 'big-knife person'; ommakistowan has about the same meaning. The prominence of Boston in the early history of the United States led to its name being used for 'American' on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coast. The Micmac to-day call the United States Boston, and an American Bostonkawaach; the Nipissing Bastone, the Canadian Abnaki Bastoni, and the Mohawk Iroquois Wastonronon, signify not merely the inhabitants of Boston, but the New Englanders or the people of the United States in general. The share of the men in Boston in the development of the Oregon country is recalled by the term Boston, which in the Chinook jargon designates 'American.' From the jargon this word passed into a number of the languages of the Pacific coast region: Klamath, Boshtin; Kutenai, Bosten; Déné (Carrier) Boston. The eastern Déné name is Bestcorh-o'-tinne, 'people of the big knives.' The Navaho have adopted Pelikano, or Melikano, from the Spanish 'Americano.' The Hopi name is Melly-cauno (Bourke, Moquis of Arizona, 317, 1884), but among themselves they use the term Pahana, 'eastern water people.' The Zuni call Americans Melikanakwe (Cushing, in Millstone, x, 100, June 1885). The Cherokee called Americans Aniwat-nini, 'Virginians,' from Watsini 'Virginia' (Mooney).

English.—One of the earliest terms for 'Englishman' is the Natick uautacone, 'coat man,' 'he who wears clothing.' Others, the Pequot, waunnux, 'somebody coming,' the term used also for 'Frenchman' in several eastern Algonquian dialects; and the Narraganset chauquaquock, 'knife men.' In the latter language Roger Williams cites Englishmannuck, and the form Englishmansog, both plurals, as also in use. The modern Canadian Abnaki has Iglizmon. A Shawnee vocabulary of 1819 (Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., 1, 290, 1820) has Englishmanake. To another group belong the Micmac Aglaseaoo, the Abnaki Anglis, the Nipissing Aganasha, the Prairie Cree Akayásiw, the Chippewa Shāganāsh (which possibly is connected with 'spearman' or the 'contemptible spearman'—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906), the Ottawa Saganash, the Cree Akaias, etc., all of which are thought to be corruptions of the French 'Anglais' or 'les Anglais.' The older forms of these words, as the Missisauga (1801) Zagunassa, the Montagnais (1800) Agaleshou, the Micmac (1800) Angalshéeau, Nascapée Naggaleshou, and the Nipissing Angalesha, seem to justify this belief, although it is possible some of these words may have been corrupted from 'English' instead of from 'Anglais.' The Abnaki corruption of 'Englishman' was Iglismon (Maurault, Abenakis, vii, 1866), Delaware Ingelishman. Long (Exped. Rocky Mts., 1823) gives for 'British' in Oto ragar-rashing, and in Omaha sukanash, both loan words from the Algonquian. In the language of the Siksika 'Englishman' is nitapiapikwan, 'real white man.' The Canadian Mohawk of Lake of Two Mountains, Quebec, call an 'Englishman' tiorhensaka, 'inhabitant of the east.' Long, early in the century, gave for 'British' in Hidatsa borheittochresha, which he interprets as meaning 'the men who bring black cloth.' In the Chinook jargon the word for 'English' is Kintshautsh, and for 'Englishmen' Kintshautshman, from 'King George,' the reigning monarch at the period in which the jargon arose. From the jargon these terms have passed into a number of the languages of the Pacific Coast region: Klamath, Skingdshudsh or King Dshutch; Kutenai, Skindjatsh, 'Canadian,' 'Englishman.' The western Déné, according to Morice (Anthropos, 1, 236-7, 1906) call the English saganaz, an Algonquian loan-word; the eastern Déné term them tsé-o'tinne, 'inhabitants of the rocks.' In Creek (of the Muskogean stock) Gatschet cites for Englishmen miklīsi, 'subjects of the great king,' with which goes Choctaw and Chicasaw minklīsi.

Scotch.—According to Cuoq (Lex. Iroq., 166, 1882), the Mohawk of Lake of Two Mountains, Quebec, called the first Scotchmen (settlers) with whom they came into contact kentahere, in reference to their headdress, 'Tam O'Shanter,' which reminded them of a cow-dropping (ota). Wilson (Ojebway Lang., 343, 1874) gives Scotchmun as the term in Canadian Chippewa. Another Chippewa name is Opi-otowew, 'he who speaks differently.' Rand gives in Micmac Skōjemēn.

French.—The Algonquian languages in particular furnish several special words for 'Frenchman,' individuals of that nationality having come into very close contact with many of the tribes of this stock, as settlers, coureurs des bois, and hunters and trappers, often having Indian wives and becoming members of aboriginal communities. The Micmac term was wenjooch (in composition wenjoo), applied to white men, sometimes even to the English, but originally and specifically to the Frenchman and signifying 'somebody coming.' That this was its original signification the related eastern Algonquian words for 'white man' indicate, as the Penobscot awenoch, the Pequot wanux, the Passamaquoddy wenoch, etc. Another Algonquian term for Frenchman is the Cree wemistikojiu, Chippewa wemītigoshī, 'people of the wooden canoes,' probably akin to the Fox wāmē'tēgowīšīta, 'one who is identified with something wooden,' probably referring to something about clothing or implements. The Fox name for a Frenchman is wāmē'tēgoshīta (Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906); Menominee, wameqtikosiu; Missisauga, wamitigushi, etc. Lahontan translated the old Algonkin mittigouchiouek, 'builders of vessels,' which Trumbull (Trans. Am. Philol. Asso., 154, 1871) considered incorrect, though he saw in it a reference to the 'wooden boats' of the French, mitigo meaning 'wooden.' An aged Missisauga woman related (Chamberlain, Lang. of Mississagas, 60, 1892) that the word referred to the boxes carried by the early French traders, but this may have been merely a folk etymology suggested by mitigush, 'trunk,' 'valise.' The Siksika word for 'Frenchman' is nitsap-pekwan. A Shawnee vocabulary of 1819 gives Tota, and Cotton's old Massachusetts vocabulary has the plural form Punach-monog, evidently taken from the English 'Frenchman.' The Abnaki corruption of 'Frenchman' was Pelajemon (Maurault, Abenakis, viii, 1866). An Hidatsa name is masik'ti, 'true white.' The Hasinai of Texas, according to Bolton, called the French Canos; in allusion to this fact the Spaniards named an Arkokisa partisan of the French, Canos.

The Mohawk of Lake of Two Mountains, Quebec, call a Frenchman onseronni, which Cuoq (Lex. Iroq., 69, 1882) interprets as 'maker of hatchets,' from konnis 'I make,' and osera 'hatchet.' This is the same name as aseronni, the appellation conferred on the first Dutch colonists of New York by the Iroquois, and apparently a more or less general term for 'white man.'

The term in Chinook jargon for Frenchman is Pasaiuks, which Hale (Chinook Jarg., 49, 1890) derives from 'Français' with the Chinook plural suffix uks. It has been used to signify also 'foreigners,' and has passed into several Indian languages of the Pacific Coast region, e. g., the Klamath Pashúyuks. The Kutenai call a Frenchman nottukene, 'foreigner,' 'stranger.' According to Grossman (Smithson. Rep. 1871, 412, 1873) the Pima called a Frenchman parlesick (plural, paparlesick), from parle (Spanish, padre), 'priest.' The Athapascan Takulli call a Frenchman neto or nudo.

German.—Some of the Indian tongues have special words for 'German.' The Chippewa term is Anima, a modification of the French Allemand, introduced by traders or missionaries. Baraga (Otchipwe Dict., pt. 2, 36, 1880), says: "The Indians also call a German 'Detchman,' a corruption of 'Dutchman,' as the Germans are improperly called in some parts of this country." From the French comes also the Micmac Alma. The Sauk and Fox have Túchi^a, from 'Dutch.' In Klamath the term for 'German' is Detchmal, while in the Modoc dialect of the Lutuanian stock the name applied to the German settler is munitchuleks gitko, 'thickset fellow' (Gatschet, Klamath Inds., II, 1890). Mooney (Myths of Cherokee, 141, 1902) mentions a noted Cherokee chief about 1830 who was named Tahchee, or 'Dutch.' He gives the plural Cherokee name as Anitútsi (Cherokee MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1887). A Blackfoot word for 'German' is kistappekwan. The Creek name for a German, according to Adair (Am. Inds., 66, 1775), was yah yah algeh, 'those whose talk was ja ja.' The Chickasaw name was kish kish tarakshe (ibid., 7).

Spanish.—The contact of the Indian tribes of the Southern states with Spanish explorers, settlers, and colonizers gave rise to several names for them. The Algonquian dialects of the Great Lakes and the E. have taken their words for Spaniard from the English or French: Nipissing Espanio, from the French Espagnol, as also the Chippewa Ishpayo and the Siksika Spiokuan, or Spiokuwin, 'Mexican,' 'Spaniard.' The Sauk and Foxes have A'payo^a for Spaniard, and Mühiko^a for Mexican. The Cherokee term for Spaniard is Askwani, derived from the Spanish Español, to which was added the tribal prefix ani, making Aniskwani, 'Spaniards.' The Arkokisa called the Spaniards Yegsa. The Klamath have Spaniolkui, from Español, with the Indian suffix. The Mohawk of Lake of Two Mountains, Quebec, use Eskwanior, from the French Espagnol. For Mexicans of various districts the Indians along the border have developed special terms: Kiowa ü-ta'-ka-i, literally 'timber Mexicans,' applied to inhabitants of Tamaulipas; do kañi-ta'ka-i, 'bark Mexicans,' inhabitants of Santa Rosa mts.; ko p-ta'ka-i, 'mountain whites,' used for New Mexicans and sometimes generally for Mexicans; tsoñ-ta'ka-i, 'light-haired Mexicans'; tso-ta'ka-i, 'rock white men,' Mexicans about Silver City, N. Mex.; pa-edal-ta'ka-i, 'great-river whites,' Mexicans of the Rio Grande, etc. (Mooney in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 435, 1898). The Navaho term for Mexicans is naakai, 'white foreigners' and for Spaniards, naakai-diyini, 'holy white foreigners.' The Olamentke of California called the Spaniards by the name, Olingo, that they applied to the Aleut brought thither by the Russians, which seems to be the same word, Ulenego, as that which they applied to themselves as Indians. The Russians they call by another term, levuyume. The Mohave Indians call a Mexican or a Spaniard haiko tahana, 'long white man,' while the Zuni, who received their first knowledge of the white man in the person of the early Spanish explorers from Mexico, call the Mexicans tsipolo-kwe, 'mustached people.' The old Tonkawa term for a Mexican is tóptcho, the newer one kanushá-akon.

Negro.—Among certain Indian tribes the name of the negro signifies simply 'black flesh.' This is the meaning of the Chippewa ma'kadäwiyas, the Cree kaskite wiyas, etc. The Delaware nescalenk signifies 'black face.' Some others designate him as 'black man,' which is the sense of the Nipissing makatewinini, the Yuchi kúispi, etc. 'Black Indian' is the meaning of the Kutenai kamkokokotl aktsemakinek, the latter term signifying 'Indian' as distinguished from 'man,' titkat, and kitonaga, 'Kutenai.' The Delaware nesgessit lenape has a similar signification. Sometimes the word for 'black' alone is used, as the Kutenai kamkokokotl, etc. With several tribes 'black white man,' or, in some cases, 'black foreigners,' is the real meaning of the term for negro, as the Mohave waiko kwanil and the Comanche duqtaivo, from duq, black, and taivo, 'white man' or 'foreigner'; also the Siksika siksapikwan, napikwan signifying 'white man'; and the Kiowa koñkyäoñ-k'ia, 'man with black on, or incorporated into, him.' The Narraganset of Roger Williams's time "called a blackamoor suckauttacone, a coal-black man, for sucki is black and wautacone one that wears clothes"; according to Trumbull (Natick Dict., 226) sucki means 'dark-colored,' not 'black,' and Wautacone was one of the names by which an Englishman was designated; hence, 'black Englishman' might be a fair rendering of the word. Analogous is the Menominee word for negro, apésen wameqtikosiu, 'black Frenchman.' According to Gatschet the Kiowa Apache word for negro, lizhena, means 'buffalo-black-haired.' In Klamath waiha, applied to the negro, signifies 'servant,' and the Timucua atem-machu means 'his black slave.' The Klamath have besides adopted from the whites the term nigga, from which is derived niggalam shaamoksh, the term for monkey, meaning literally 'negro'skins-man.'

Dutch.—The Iroquoian tribes of New York called a Dutchman aseronni, a term identical with onseronni, by which the Mohawk of Lake of Two Mountains, Quebec, designate a Frenchman to-day. Its literal signification seems to be 'maker of hatchets.' The Iroquois used the word as an adjective to designate several things, as ooskah asseroni, 'flax,' in Onondaga, literally, 'Dutchman's thread'; ossaheta asseroni, 'peas,' literally, 'Dutch beans' (Beauchamp in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, xv, 96, 98, 1902). The Delawares of New Jersey called the Dutch by a name spelled by the early writers swannekins. Without the English s this is evidently identical with the Delaware schwonnachquin, 'white people,' literally, 'people from the salt sea (schwon),' a term used to designate Europeans in general.

Chinaman.—Some of the Indian tribes, through the actual presence among them of the Oriental, others by indirection only, have come to have special names for the Chinaman. The Kutenai, who know him from actual observation, call the Chinaman gooktlam, the chief component of which is aqkoktlam, 'hair,' in reference to his queue. The Chinook jargon has adopted the English word. The Siksika name is apotsepista. The Kiowa name signifies 'yellow man.' (A. F. C.)

Racket. See Ball play, Games.

Rahasálali ('oak wood'). A Tarahumare rancheria near Palanquo, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lunholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Rahaughoon. See Racoon.

Rahun. An important Yaqui settlement on the n. bank of the lower Rio Yaqui, s. w. Sonora, Mexico. Escudero estimated its population at 6,000 in 1849, but its present number is not known.

Asuncion de Baum.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 355, 1864. Racum.—Escudero, Not. Son. y Sin., 100, 1849. Rahum.—Velasco (1850) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 608, 1852. Raún.—Mühlenpfordt, ibid.

Rahway. See Rockaway.

Raiabó ('the slope,' or 'the hillock'). The name of several distinct rancherias of the Tarahumare not far from Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lunholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Rain-in-the-Face. A noted Sioux warrior and chief, born near the forks of Cheyenne r., N. Dak., about 1835, died at Standing Rock res., in the same state, Sept. 14, 1905. He was a full-blood Hunkpapa, one of a family of six brothers, one of whom was known as Iron Horse. Shortly before his death, he said: "My father was not a chief; my grandfather was not a chief, but a good hunter and a feast-maker. On my mother's side I had some noted ancestors, but they left me no chieftainship. I had to work for my reputation" (Eastman in Outlook, Oct. 27, 1906). He received his common name as the result of a personal encounter, when about 10 years of age, with a Cheyenne boy, whom he worsted; he received several blows in the face, however, causing it to be spattered with blood and streaked where the paint had been washed away. When a young man, he joined a war-party against the Gros Ventres, some of whose horses they stole, but the Sioux party was overtaken and had to fight for their lives. Rain-in-the-Face had his face painted to represent the sun when half covered with darkness—half black and half red. Fighting all day in the rain, his face became partly washed and streaked with red and black, so again he was named Rain-in-the-Face. He had been many times on the warpath, but his first important experience as a warrior was in the attack on the troops near Ft Phil Kearny, Wyo., in Dec. 1866, in which Capt. Fetterman and his entire command of 80 men were killed. He participated also in a fight, two years later, near Ft Totten, Dak., in which he and his horse were wounded. About three years before the Custer massacre in 1876, Rain-in-the-Face was accused of killing a surgeon and a trader of Gen. Stanley's expedition, for which he was arrested by Col. Thomas Custer. Having confessed his guilt, he was imprisoned for a time, but was allowed by his guard to escape and joined Sitting Bull's band of hostiles in the spring of 1874, declaring that he would "cut the heart out of Tom Custer and eat it." Rain-in-the-Face was a leading participant in the Little Bighorn fight, and although it has frequently been stated that he personally killed Gen. Custer, this is now generally doubted, and was denied by him. From wounds received in this battle he was permanently lamed, yet he followed Sitting Bull into Canada, where he remained until 1880, when most of the fugitives surrendered to Gen. Miles at Ft Keogh, Mont. He had seven wives, few of whom lived long or happily with him; the last wife was found in his tipi with her throat cut.

Ramah. An Eskimo mission established on the e. coast of Labrador by the Moravians in 1871.—Thompson, Moravian, Miss., 230, 1890.

Ramcock. The village of the Rancocas, on Rancocas cr., N. J., in the 17th century.

Ramcock.—Evelin (ca. 1648) quoted by Proud, Penn., I, 113, 1797. Rancokeskill.—Newcastle conf. (1675) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XII, 523, 1877 (Rancokus creek; kill=creek). Rankokus.—Doc. of 1674, ibid., III, 223, 1853 (applied to the hill).

Ramushonok. A Chowanoc (?) village in 1585, apparently between the Meherrin and Nottoway rs., in Hertford co., N. C. Ramushonoq.—Smith (1629), Va., II, map, repr. 1819. Ramushouug.—DeBry, map, in Hawks, N. C., I, 1859.

Rancheria Grande. The name applied to a large aggregation of Indians who lived during the greater part of the first half of the 18th century near the middle Brazos r., Texas. It was closely associated with the Tonkawan tribes of the region, but in origin it was a curious composite. To the Ervapiame, perhaps natives of the region, there were added (1) the remains of numerous broken-down tribes from near and even beyond the Rio Grande, who had moved eastward and settled with the Ervapiame for defence and protection against the Apache, and to escape punishment at the hands of the Spaniards for damages done on the frontier, and (2) many apostates from the missions of the Rio Grande and the San Antonio missions. Because of the prominence of the Ervapiame in the group, it was sometimes called "Rancheria Grande de los Ervapiames." The presence of the apostates in the settlement made it especially obnoxious to the missionaries (Arch. Col. Santa Cruz de Querétaro, K, leg. 19, doc. 19, 1729, MS.). Rancheria Grande is mentioned in the Spanish records as early as 1707, when Diego Ramón, captain at San Juan Bautista, set out to punish it for disturbances at the missions (Diego Ramón, Diario, 1707, MS.). It was then said to be on the San Marcos, perhaps the Colorado. Again, in 1714, he recovered from it apostates from the missions (Arch. Col. Santa Cruz de Querétaro, op. cit.).

In 1716, when Capt. Ramón and Fr. Espinosa passed through it, it was 2 or 3 leagues w. of the Brazos, above the junction of its two arms, and above the mouth of the San Xavier, now the San Gabriel and the Little r. This would apparently put the rancheria above Cameron, in Milam co. According to Ramón there were more than 2,000 Indians, mostly gentile but some apostate, of various tribes, the most important being the Ervapiame. Espinosa noted also Tiemanares, Mesquites, Pamayas, Payaves, Mescales, Cantonaes, Xarames, and Sijames (Ramón, Derrotero, 149-152, 1716, MS.; Espinosa, Diario, entries from May 30 to June 14, MS.).

In 1722 the mission of San Xavier de Náxera was founded at San Antonio for the Ervapiame of Rancheria Grande, and their settlement became known as the Ervapiame suburb. Among those baptized there, the Ervapiames, Muruames, and Ticmanares were the most numerous. A Guerjuatida "from Rancheria Grande" was in the list. Other tribal names, some of which may represent intermarriages at the missions, were Tucara (Tawakoni?), Pamaya, Pazaguan, Gabilan, and Cantunal. Rancheria Grande continued to be mentioned as near San Xavier r., and it was four chiefs of the Yojuanes, Maieyes (unquestionably Tonkawan tribes), Deadozes, and Rancheria Grande who asked for the missions later founded (ca. 1749) on San Xavier r. (Dispatch of the Viceroy, Mar. 26, 1751, Lamar Papers, MS.). The Tonkawa tribe also offered to enter these missions, and were assigned to that of San Francisco Xavier, with the Yojuanes, Maieyes, and Ervapiames, or Rancheria Grande Indians, apart from the Karankawan and the Bidai-Arkokisa groups which entered the other two missions near by. These facts, together with the additional one that the Apache were enemies of the San Xavier group, are only a few of numerous indications that Rancheria Grande was largely Tonkawan in its affiliation. The Indians had dogs and horses, engaged in only a little agriculture, were expert hunters and fighters, traded in skins, and made rafts of skins and of poles and reeds. (H. E. B.)

Ranchos (Span.: Los Ranchos, 'the ranches'). A former pueblo of the Taos Indians, about 3 m. from Taos pueblo, N. N. Mex., which in 1854 had become a Mexicanized town.—Lane in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 689, 1855. It is now known as Ranchos de Taos.

Rancocas. A division of the Delawares formerly living on the E. bank of Delaware r., in the present Burlington co., N. J. Their village was Ramcock. They were estimated at 100 warriors about 1648. Ohichequas.—Proud, Penn., II, 294, 1798. Lamikas.—Ibid. Ramkokes.—Deed of 1649 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Rappahannock (Renape: Rāp̄hān̄k, 'the alternating stream.' In Northern Lenape the addition of k to -hān̄ gave the stream name a specific meaning, and this terminal letter had the same force as the definite article 'the'. The termination -ock in the Southern Renape word may be the animate plural suffix; if so, the word would mean 'people of the alternating (ebb and flow) stream.' However this may be, the suffix is not locative, since the Renape characteristic of the locative is -uk, not -k. The cognate name of the river, Tappahannock, is still preserved as a place name in Essex co., Va. See Am. Anthr., vi, 315, 320-29, 1904; vii, 238, 1905.—(Gerard). A tribe of the Powhatan confederacy formerly living on Rappahannock r. in Richmond co., Va. In 1608 they numbered about 400.

Rappahannock. The principal village of the Rappahannock, situated at the mouth of a creek, on Rappahannock r. It was extinct in 1722.

Toppahanock.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 37, 1849.

Raquette. See Bull play, Games.

Rararachi (Ra-ra'-ra-chi, 'bought'). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare, near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico. Also called Rararachic, but mainly by the Mexicans.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Rarenaw. See Roanoke.

Raritan (a corruption, by the Dutch of New Jersey, of ērārūwitan, or by aphoresis, 'rūrūwitan, 'the stream overflows so (or in such a way)'). The form Raritan represents the participle 'rūrūwitan, 'the stream which overflows so (or in such a way)'. Owing to the frequent inundation of the land by the overflow of the river due to freshets, the Indians inhabiting its banks were, according to Van Tienhoven, compelled to remove farther inland.—(Gerard). A former important division of the New Jersey Delawares, occupying the valley of Raritan r. and the left bank of Delaware r. as far down as the falls at Trenton, where they seem to have had an important settlement (see Assunpink). They are frequently mentioned as a confederacy, and one writer says they had "two sachenidoms and about 20 chieftaincies." They were estimated at 1,200 warriors about 1646, but this is doubtless a gross exaggeration. Owing to troubles with the Dutch and the inroads of the southern Indians, they retired soon afterward to the mountains. They gradually sold their lands, until in 1802 they, with remnants of other New Jersey tribes, were reduced to a small reservation called Brotherton, in Eversham, Burlington co. By invitation of the Stockbridges and Brothertons, then in Oneida co., N. Y., they joined them in that year. In 1832, being then reduced to about 40 souls, they sold their last rights in New Jersey and afterward removed with the other tribe to Green bay, Wis. (J. M.)

Rat. See Adario.

Rathroche (Ra-ſro'-pe). A subgens of the Pakhtha or Beaver gens of the Iowa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 239, 1897.

Rations. See Agency system.

Raton (Span.: 'mouse,' but in the S. W. usually 'rat'). A Papago village in s. Arizona, with 140 inhabitants in 1858.

Del Raton.—Bailey in Ind. Aff. Rep., 208, 1858.

Ratontita (Span.-Mex.: 'place of the rat,' from a sacred stuffed mouse that hangs in the temple). A Huichol rancheria, with a temple and adjoining god houses, situated in the Sierra de los Huicholes, about 12 m. w. of Bolaños, in Jalisco, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., ii, 262, 1902.

Taquitzata.—Lumholtz, op. cit. ('the silk of corn is falling': Huichol name).

Rattles. Instruments for producing rhythmic sound, used by all tribes except some of the Eskimo. The rattle was generally regarded as a sacred object, not to be brought forth on ordinary occasions, but confined to rituals, religious feasts, shamanistic performances, etc. This character is emphasized in the sign language of the plains, where the sign for rattle is the basis of all signs indicating that which is sacred. Early in the 16th century, Estevan, the negro companion of Cabeza de Vaca, traversed with perfect immunity great stretches of country in northwestern Mexico, occupied by numerous tribes, bearing a cross in one hand and a gourd rattle in the other. Eskimo used rattles for enticing seals into the water.

Rattles may be divided into two general classes, those in which objects of approximately equal size are struck together, and those in which small objects, such as pebbles, quartz crystals, or seeds, are inclosed in hollow receptacles. The first embraces rattles made of animal hoofs or dewclaws, bird beaks, shells, pods, etc. These were held in the hand, fastened to blankets, belts, or leggings, or made into necklaces or anklets so as to make a noise when the wearer moved. On the N. W. coast, puffin beaks were strung on a frame composed of pieces of wood bent into two concentric rings and held together by crosspieces. From the Eskimo a similar rattle has been obtained in which the puffin beaks are replaced by bear claws. In the W., pecten shells were strung together to make rattles, while among some California tribes olivella shells took the place of the deer hoofs used by others. The Pueblos make rattles of conus and olivella shells, as well as of antelope hoofs, tortoise shells, and gourds. One Omaha rattle mentioned by Dorsey was made of the molars of the elk. The Tepehuane used the empty pods of the palm for ankle rattles. In this connection may be mentioned the clappers of bone and wood used by the Tlingit, Haida, and other peoples.

The second type of rattle was made of a gourd, of the entire shell of a tortoise, of pieces of rawhide sewed together, or, as on the N. W. coast, of wood. It was usually decorated with paintings, carvings, or feathers and pendants, very often having a symbolic meaning. The performer, besides shaking these rattles with the hand, sometimes struck them against an object. Women of the Gulf tribes fastened several tortoise-shell rattles to each leg where they were concealed by their clothing. Little drums inclosing pebbles were used by the Mandan and the Pueblos, as well as by children among the Labrador Eskimo. Many tribes made rattles of loop shape out of dried buffalo tails, and one has been found in Tennessee, made of pottery. The copper tinklers of the S. W., and ceramic vessels with heads containing loose clay pellets, are other varieties. Pueblo children found a natural rattle provided for them in the pods of the rattlebox plant. Most curious of all was a rattle used by the Pima and the Indians of California, which consisted of a number of cocoons strung together containing small stones.

On the N. W. coast, besides common rattles for festive occasions, there were oval wooden rattles, which were the property of shamans, and wooden rattles having many designs around a central figure of the raven, which were used almost exclusively by chiefs. The carving on shamans' rattles generally represented supernatural helpers, and it may be noted that Tlingit shamans often had special rattle spirits, separate from their other helpers. For illustrations of rattles, see Music and Musical Instruments.

Rawhide. The great strength and toughness of rawhide rendered it useful to the Indian in an almost equal degree with sinew, and among all tribes it was prized for these qualities. The skins of various large land and aquatic animals were made into rawhide, varying, according to the animal, in thinness, color, strength, etc. In preparing rawhide the skin was fleshed, dehaired, and stretched till it dried, when it was ready for use. Whole buffalo or cow skins were used as covers for the bull-boats of the Sioux and other tribes of the upper Missouri, and deerskins and seal and sea-lion skins, joined by sewing, covered the canoes, kaiaks, and umiaks of the tribes of the far N. Pieces of rawhide were folded or sewn to form the parfleche trunks and knife, feather, and arrow cases, pouches, and pemmican bags of the Plains tribes, who used also circular pieces of thick hide for pemmican or fruit mortars. Buckets, dippers, cups, drumheads, rattles, shields, cradles, etc., were made of rawhide by many tribes, and helmet masks were made of the same material by the Pueblos.

The property which green rawhide has of greatly shrinking in drying was made use of in many ways—notably for casing handles and heads of stone clubs, for mending broken articles, and for making drumheads and lacing them. Sometimes rings of rawhide from the tails of animals were shrunk on club handles or pipe stems, like bands of iron. Soles of moccasins were made of this material in the W., and the Plains tribes often utilized old parflèche cases for this purpose. Cut in strips of differing sizes, rawhide was used for harness, thongs, whiplashes, wattling, for making cages, fencing, etc. Narrow strips, called babiche by the French, were employed for fishing and harpoon lines, nets, lacing for snowshoes, rackets, ball sticks, and gaming wheels. Bags (sometimes called by their Algonquian name muske-moots) of fine workmanship were knit of babiche. Braided babiche was the material of reatas, halters, cinches, and carrying-straps. See Parflèche, Shaganappi, Skins and Skin-dressing. (W. H.)

Rawranoke. See Romnoke.

Rayon. A former village of the Opata in Sonora, Mexico, but now a civilized settlement. Besides Opata and Pima (Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., vi, 72, 1904), the settlement contained 63 Yaqui in 1900.

Razboinski (Russian: 'robbers'). A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on the right bank of the Yukon, Alaska, near the head of the delta; pop. 151 in 1880.

Echaketan. Given by Krause (Tlinkit Indianer, 116, 1885) as a Tlingit division of the Raven clan in the Chilkat town of Klukwan, Alaska. Unidentified.

Echauntass-hade. Quoted by Krause (Tlinkit Indianer, 304, 1885) as the name of a branch of the Haida of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It is not identifiable with any known group.

Reaum's Village. A former Chippewa village, so called after the chief, on Flint r., Mich., on a tract about the boundary of Genesee and Saginaw cos., ceded to the United States under the treaty of Jan. 14, 1837. The Reaum family, from which the chief evidently derived his name, was prominent in the early history of Michigan.

Receptacles. Objects of mineral, vegetal, or animal material, the chief function of which is merely to contain things. The term receptacle includes all that is meant by the following terms: bag, basin, basket, boat, bottle, bowl, box, cache, canteen, case, with many names (awl-case, bow-case, plume-case, food-case, etc.), chest, coffin, cradle, cup, dish, gourd, granary, grave, jar, ladle, mortar, net, olla, oven, parflèche, pit, platter, pot, pouch, purse, quiver, reservoir, sack, scabbard, spoon, tinaja, tray, trough, trunk, urn, vase, vessel, wallet—a vast family of utensils, wonderfully varied in form, material, and size, whose functions include, beside the simple one of holding, those of gathering, carrying, serving, sifting, boiling, baking, mixing, grinding, pounding, pouring, evaporating, sprinkling, etc.

Men, even in the lowest known stages of culture, employ receptacles for food and drink, relying largely on those furnished by nature, as fruit cases, shells of mollusks and turtles, bladders, etc., while others, for varied purposes, are improvised of bark, leaves, skins of animals, and the like. The inventive genius of the tribes was constantly called into requisition to improve on and multiply the natural facilities. Strands of bark, grass, leaves, hair, and other filaments, employed originally in holding and carrying solid objects, were also combined in various ways, supplying nets, baskets, cradles, quivers, and hammocks; and pliable branches, twigs, and leaves served for the construction of shelters, dwellings, caches, and granaries. Nature furnished varied receptacles for water, as lakes, ponds, springs, and cavities in rocks, and the tribes constructed reservoirs and cisterns, making residence possible on many arid sites. Stone vessels in the form of concretions were available in some sections, and these were modified and used as cups and dishes, and with advanced communities the softer stones, and with some even the harder varieties, were carved into vessels of many forms. The use of baked clay made it possible to shape receptacles for many purposes which, in their highest development, took graceful shapes and were tastefully embellished. A joint of cane, readily severed, formed an exceptionally neat cup, and wooden utensils shaped by means of charring, scraping, and cutting were in almost universal use by the tribes, serving countless useful purposes. The more important varieties of receptacles are herein treated under their individual names. (W. H. H.)

Rechquaakie (contr. and corruption of rekawihaki, 'sandy land.'—Gerard). A former Rockaway village near the present Rockaway, Long id., N. Y.

Rechquaakie.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 110, 1872. Reckheweck.—Ibid., 155. Rockaway.—Ibid., 110.

Rechtanck. A former Manhattan village on Manhattan id., N. Y. In 1643 it was temporarily occupied by some fugitive Wecquaesgeek, who were attacked and massacred by the Dutch.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 106, 1872.

Red Bank. A former Cherokee settlement on Etowah r., at or near the present county seat of Canton, Cherokee co., Ga.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, map, 1887.

Red Bird (Wānig-suchkē). A Winnebago war chief, so named, according to one authority, because he habitually wore a red coat and called himself English, and by another because he wore on each shoulder, "to supply the place of an epaulette, a preserved red-bird." He was born about 1788 and was the leading spirit in the Winnebago outbreak of 1827. He was friendly with the settlers of Prairie du Chien, Wis., who regarded him as a protector until two Winnebago, who had been arrested for the murder of a family of maple-sugar makers, were erroneously reported to have been turned over to the Chippewa by the military authorities at Ft Snelling and clubbed to death while running the gauntlet. The Winnebago chiefs, on the receipt of this news, met in council and determined upon retaliation, selecting Red Bird to carry out their decree. With this purpose in view he, with two companions, after visiting the house of Lockwood, a trader at Prairie du Chien, proceeded to the house of Registre Garnier, who with his hired man they shot down after being hospitably entertained by them. An infant was torn from the mother (who made her escape), and was stabbed and left for dead, though subsequently restored. Red Bird and his companions proceeded the same day, June 28, 1827, to the rendezvous of his band, consisting of 37 warriors with their wives and children, at the mouth of Bad Axe r., Minn. A day or two later they attacked a boat on the Mississippi, killing 4 and wounding 2 of the crew, and losing a third of their own number. When the troops arrived and prepared to attack the Winnebago, Red Bird and his accomplices gave themselves up and were tried and convicted, but sentence was deferred until the last day of the general court, and then, for some unknown cause, was not pronounced. With his companions Red Bird was remanded to prison to await sentence, where he died, Feb. 16, 1828. The others were condemned to death, but were pardoned by President John Quincy Adams, in Nov. 1828, at the instance of Nawkaw, who, with a deputation of his tribesmen, visited Washington in their behalf.

Redbones. See Croatan Indians.

Red Cedar Lake. A Chippewa village on Red Cedar lake, Barron co., Wis.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 191, 1885.

Red Clay (free translation of Eldud'di, abbreviated form of Eldud'di, 'red earth place'). A Cherokee settlement, popularly known as Yellow-hill settlement, and now officially called Cherokee. It is the post-office and agency headquarters for the East Cherokee, and is situated on Oconaluftee r., in Swain co., N. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 517, 1900.

Red Cliff. A Chippewa band formerly attached to La Pointe agency, near the w. end of L. Superior, in Wisconsin or Minnesota.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 332, 1874.

Red Cloud (Makhpia-lūta, 'Scarlet Cloud,' frequently known among his people as Makhpia-sha, 'Red Cloud'). A principal chief of the Oglala Teton Sioux of Pine Ridge res., the largest band of the Sioux nation, and probably the most famous and powerful chief in the history of the tribe. The origin of the name is disputed, but is said by ex-agent McGillycuddy (inf'n, 1906) to refer to the way in which his scarlet-blanketed warriors formerly covered the hillsides like a red cloud. If this be true, the name was bestowed after he had obtained recognition as a leader.

Red Cloud was born at the forks of Platte r., Nebr., in 1822, and died at Pine Ridge, S. Dak., Dec. 10, 1909. He was a member of the Snake family, the most distinguished and forceful of his tribe, and rose to prominence by his own force of character, having no claim to hereditary chiefship, which in the Oglala band rested with the family represented by They-fear-even-his-horse ("Young-man-afraid-of-his-horses"), the latter being more conservative and more friendly toward civilization. Red Cloud's father died of drunkenness brought about by the introduction of liquor into the tribe without stint, commencing about 1821. When in 1865 the Government undertook to build a road from Ft Laramie, Wyo., on the North Platte, by way of Powder r. to the gold regions of Montana, Red Cloud headed the opposition for his tribe, on the ground that the influx of travel along the trail would destroy the best remaining buffalo ground of the Indians. The first small detachment of troops sent out to begin construction work were intercepted by Red Cloud with a large party of Oglala Sioux and Cheyenne, and held practically as prisoners for more than two weeks, but finally were allowed to proceed when it seemed to the chief that they might be massacred by his young men. In the fall of the same year commissioners were sent to treat with the Oglala for permission to build the road, but Red Cloud forbade the negotiations and refused to attend the council.

On June 30, 1866, another council for the same purpose was called at Ft Laramie, Red Cloud this time attending and repeating his refusal to endanger the hunting grounds of his people. While he was speaking, a strong force of troops under Gen. Carrington arrived, and on being told, in reply to a question, that they had come to build forts and open the road to Montana, he seized his rifle and with a final defiant message left the council with his entire following. Carrington then set out on his mission, which included the rebuilding and garrisoning of Ft Reno, on Powder r., and the establishment of Ft Phil Kearny and Ft C. F. Smith, the last named being on Bighorn r., in Montana. Another protest to Carrington himself proving ineffectual, Red Cloud surrounded the troops and working force at Ft Kearny with perhaps 2,000 warriors and harassed them so constantly that not even a load of hay could be brought in from the prairie except under the protection of a strong guard, while it was made impossible to venture out after the game that was abundant all around. On Dec. 21, 1866, an entire detachment of 81 men under Capt. Fetterman was cut off and every man killed. On Aug. 1, 1867, another severe engagement occurred near the post. In all this time not a single wagon had been able to pass over the road, and in 1868 another commission was appointed to come to terms with Red Cloud, who demanded as an ultimatum the abandonment of the three posts and of all further attempts to open the Montana road. A treaty was finally made on this basis, defining the limits of the Sioux country as claimed by the Sioux, Red Cloud refusing to sign or even to be present until the garrisons had actually been withdrawn, thus winning a complete victory for the position which he had taken from the beginning. He finally affixed his signature at Ft Laramie, Nov. 6, 1868. From that date he seems to have kept his promise to live at peace with the whites, although constantly resisting the innovations of civilization. He took no active part in the Sioux war of 1876, although he is accused of having secretly aided and encouraged the hostiles. Being convinced of the hopelessness of attempting to hold the Black hills after the discovery of gold in that region, he joined in the agreement of cession in 1876. In the outbreak of 1890-91 also he remained quiet, being then an old man and partially blind, and was even said to have been threatened by the hostiles on account of his loyal attitude toward the Government.

As a warrior Red Cloud stood first among his people, having counted 80 coups (q. v.) or separate deeds of bravery in battle. As a general and statesman he ranked equally high, having been long prominent in treaties and councils, and several times a delegate to Washington, his attitude having been always that of a patriot from the Indian standpoint. Unlike Indians generally, he had but one wife, with whom he lived from early manhood. Personally he is described by one well acquainted with him as a most courtly chief and a natural-born gentleman, with a bow as graceful as that of a Chesterfield. For some years before his death he was blind and decrepit, and lived in a house built for him by the Government. His immediate band is known as Iteshicha (q. v.) (J. M.)

Red Eagle. See Weatherford, William.

Red Fish. A prominent Oglala Sioux chief about 1840. He led his people against the Crows in 1841, and met a serious repulse which cost him his position and influence. Father De Smet met him at Ft Pierre, in the present South Dakota, in the latter year. (D. R.)

Red Head. A prominent Onondaga, whose English name was borne by an earlier chief, but his native name is not mentioned. He drew a map of the St Lawrence for Sir Wm. Johnson in Aug. 1759, and was an active war chief. A creek E. of Oswego, N. Y., was called Red Head's cr. Sir William "condoled" his death at Oswego, Aug. 1764, he having fallen dead in the fort before the baronet's arrival. See Stone, Life of Sir William Johnson, II, 219, 402, 409, 1865.

Red Horn. A Piegan chief. The border troubles caused by lawless whites and horse-stealing Indians reached such a pitch in the fall of 1869 that Col. E. M. Baker took out an expedition in the winter to punish the truculent bands of Piegan. He surprised the camp of Red Horn on Marias r., Mont., Jan. 23, 1870, while smallpox was raging among the inmates, and the soldiers killed Red Horn and 172 others. The number of women and children among these was later a subject of controversy. See Dunn, Massacres of the Mountains, 509-42, 1886.

Red Iron Band. A former Sisseton Sioux band, named from its chief, Mazahsha, residing at the mouth of Lac qui Parler, Minn. They were friendly in the outbreak of 1862, and after the massacre prevented the escape of Little Crow with 276 captives into the far N. W. This band was a part of the so-called Traverse des Sioux band. (D. R.)

Red Jacket. A noted Seneca orator and chief of the "merit" class (see chiefs) of the Wolf clan, born about 1756, probably at Canoga, in Seneca co., N. Y., where a monument commemorates his birth; died on the former "Buffalo reservation" of the Seneca, on lands now within the limits of Buffalo, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1830. In civil life his Indian name was Otetiani, probably meaning 'prepared' or 'ready'. On his elevation to a chiefship, he received the name 'Shagöi'wathä' (commonly spelled Sa-go-yewat-ha), signifying literally 'he them causes to be awake,' and, as a name, 'he who causes them to be awake,' a designation having no reference to his reputed ability as an effective speaker, although this seems to be the popular inference. Being a member of the Wolf clan of the Seneca, the Indian names received by Red Jacket belonged, according to custom, exclusively to this important clan. And, institutionally, clan names were in large measure designations descriptive of some distinctive feature, attitude, habit, or other phenomenon characteristic of the clan tutelary. So it being one of the marked habits of the wolf to disturb or awaken people at night by howling or by other means, there naturally would be a personal name belonging to the Wolf clan which embodied this lupine trait and which in this case became the name of a tribal but not federal chiefship therein. This is also an official name among the Cayuga. In the American Revolution, his tribe, the Seneca, having reluctantly espoused the cause of Great Britain, Red Jacket, although strongly opposed to this course of his people, took the field with his fellow warriors. At once his ability and intelligence attracted the attention of British officers, one of whom gave him a brilliant red jacket, which, when worn out, was replaced by a second, and so on until this distinctive dress became a characteristic feature of its wearer, whence his popular name. Red Jacket was frequently employed in carrying dispatches, but he took no very active part in the actual fighting; indeed, he was even reproached with being a coward for certain conduct in the field by the great fighting chief, Cornplanter. During the invasion of the Seneca country by Gen. Sullivan in 1779, Cornplanter sought to make a stand against the American forces on the shore of Canandaigua lake, but on the approach of the American troops, a number of Indians, including Red Jacket, began to retreat. Seeing the ill effect of this movement, Cornplanter endeavored to rally the fugitives. Placing himself in front of Red Jacket, he sought to persuade him and his fellow refugees to turn back to fight, but his efforts were fruitless; in anger, the battled chief, turning to Red Jacket's young wife, exclaimed, "Leave that man; he is a coward!"

Red Jacket was reputed to have had a most tenacious memory and a quick wit, and, being a ready and effective speaker, he possessed a remarkable gift for defensive debate; but, judging from his interpreted speeches and from his course in life, it is evident he was not a deep, broad-minded thinker, and so justly he could hardly be called a great orator. He was at all times an egotist, and his mind was of so narrow a cast that he failed to see that he and his people had reached a point where they had to strive to adjust themselves so far as practicable to the new conditions brought about by the coming of the white race. And so he likewise failed to read aright the lesson taught by the cataclysm that engulfed the institutions of the Iroquois of the League when the avenging army of Sullivan desolated their homes, their orchards, and their harvests in 1779. The meager measure of importance that finally attached to Red Jacket arose largely from his usefulness in communicating officially with the whites after his tribe had unfortunately lost the greater number of its leading warriors and noted chieftains. This usefulness lay in his ready utterance, in his remarkable memory of the events and transactions between his people and the white men, where written records were wanting or of little use for the lack of ability to read and write, and, lastly, in his inordinate fondness to be in the public eye. In no other respect was his influence or usefulness among his people great. They recognized in him merely a fluent speaker; not a reformer or a great leader, but rather a man who was an adept in giving utterance to the thoughts of others or to the common opinion of his tribe or immediate followers rather than to something new and constructive.

It is commonly believed that Red Jacket was present at the treaty of Ft Stanwix in 1784, and that he made a great speech there in opposition to it. But this is a mistake, since there is no authentic evidence that he was in attendance there in any capacity, and, indeed, he was not then a chief. The speech of Red Jacket at the great council of the confederated Indians held at the mouth of Detroit two years later, was, according to authentic records, his first formal public address, and it has been characterized as a "masterpiece of oratory." In it the speaker eloquently opposed the burying of the hatchet, and because it voiced the predominant feeling of the assembled warriors it received warm approval. The formal address of this council to the Congress of the United States, however, was pacific yet firm in tone. It was framed and written apparently by Thayendanege, or Captain Joseph Brant, then recently from England, whose views were evidently largely shaped by the contents of a letter written to him by Sidney, one of the British secretaries of state, dated at Whitehall, Apr. 6, 1786; hence, it would seem that Thayendanege dominated the action of this council notwithstanding the alleged hostile fulminations of Red Jacket, mentioned above. Red Jacket was a staunch conservative, and, aided by his natural gifts, became the great advocate and defender of the faith and the institutions of his people, and the bitter opponent of the changes suggested and introduced by the culture of the white race. In this emergency, Red Jacket, a product of the institutions and culture of the Seneca—the so-called paganism of the Iroquois—championed the customs, the religion, and the institutions of his tribesmen, and, in addition, at least in appearance, strove manfully to prevent the sale of the lands of his people. In his chosen position he yielded nothing to persuasion, and he was unmoved by bribery or threats. Red Jacket carried his unreasoning conservatism to such a degree that he bitterly antagonized all educational, industrial, and missionary efforts designed for the betterment of his people, believing, he protested, that such instruction wholly unfitted an Indian for any kind of useful endeavor. In this belief he was not alone. Addressing himself to a young man who had been educated among the whites, he derisively exclaimed, "What have we here? You are neither a white man nor an Indian; for heaven's sake tell us, what are you?" It is even asserted that he treated with unconcealed contempt any Indian who made use of a stool or a chair in his cabin. Finally, however, the force of circumstances compelled him reluctantly to acquiesce in measures designed to ameliorate the condition of his people.

In 1821 the legislature of New York enacted a law forbidding the residence of white men on Indian lands. In the following year, the chief of the Christian party among the Seneca and the "friends of Christianity and civilization in this and adjoining counties" sought to have this law changed in such manner that ministers of the Gospel and mechanics of good moral character might be exempted from its operations. In this, however, they failed, whereupon the pagan party among the Seneca, abetted by "some white pagans," led by Red Jacket, entered complaint against the further residence of the missionary on the Seneca reservation, and in 1824 the mission was abandoned. The law, however, was later amended, and Mr Harris, the missionary, had the satisfaction of returning to the reservation in June 1825.

When the Seneca Christian party had grown in numbers and included many influential chiefs, and the schools had gained a fair foothold, its members became impatient under the dictation of one whose intemperance and profligacy had lessened him in their esteem, and in Sept. 1827 they, including 26 chiefs, took steps which resulted in the deposition of Red Jacket from his chiefship; but he was afterward relieved of this humiliation by his reinstatement through the mediation of the Office of Indian Affairs. In the document setting forth the reasons, among many, for his deposition, signed by 26 leading chiefs of his tribe, Red Jacket is charged among other things with sending, by the solicited aid of white men, falsehoods to the President; with creating and fomenting divisions and disturbances among his people; with having "a bad heart" for having in a time of famine among his people hidden the body of a deer which he had killed instead of sharing it with them; with stealing and appropriating to his own use goods which as annuities belonged to orphan children and to old people; and with being a traitor to the United States, since, in the War of 1812, they charged, "you divided us—you acted against our Father, the President, and his officers, and advised with those who were not friends."

Replying to a question asking the reasons for his unyielding opposition to the establishment of missionaries among his people, Red Jacket said, with a sarcastic smile: "Because they do us no good. If they are not useful to the white people, why do they send them among the Indians; if they are useful to the white people, and do them good, why do they not keep them at home? They are surely bad enough to need the labor of every one who can make them better. These men know that we do not understand their religion. We can not read their book; they tell different stories about what it contains, and we believe they make the book talk to suit themselves. . . . The Great Spirit will not punish for what we do not know. . . . These black coats talk to the Great Spirit, and ask light, that we may see as they do, when they are blind themselves, and quarrel about the light which guides them. These things we do not understand. . . . The black coats tell us to work and raise corn; they do nothing themselves, and would starve to death if somebody did not feed them. All they do is to pray to the Great Spirit; but that will not make corn or potatoes grow; if it will, why do they beg from us, and from the white people. . . . The Indians can never be civilized; they are not like white men. . . . We are few and weak, but may for a long time be happy, if we hold fast to our country and the religion of our fathers." The atheistic notions expressed in this reply were clearly adopted from white men.

In 1821, a woman named Caughquawtaugh, after being tried by the Seneca council, was executed as a witch by Tommy Jemmy, otherwise called Soonongize (Shonó'gaiz). This act coming to the knowledge of the neighboring whites, they had the executioner arrested and imprisoned. The plea of Tommy Jemmy at the trial was that the Indians were an independent people and so exercised original jurisdiction over their criminals.

At this trial Red Jacket was called as a witness to testify concerning the customs of his people. At an opportune moment, however, it is alleged, he gave utterance to the following sentiments as a rebuke to those who were inclined to ridicule the Indian belief in witchcraft: "What? Do you denounce us as fools and bigots, because we still believe that which you yourselves believed two centuries ago? Your black coats thundered this doctrine from the pulpit, your judges pronounced it from the bench, and sanctioned it with the formalities of law; and you would now punish our unfortunate brother, for adhering to the faith of his fathers and of yours! Go to Salem! Look at the records of your own government, and you will find that hundreds have been executed for the very crime which has called forth the sentence of condemnation against this woman and drawn down upon her the arms of vengeance. What have our brothers done, more than the rulers of your own people have done? And what crime has this man committed, by executing in a summary way the laws of his country and the command of the Great Spirit?" It is very doubtful that Red Jacket possessed all the facts stated in this alleged speech; it seems rather an extract from the brief of the defendant's attorney than the off-hand allocution of an Indian who could not write his own name and who studiously avoided the company of white men.

Red Jacket in his life was charged with want of courage and resolution, and even with timidity; with duplicity, treachery, and even with treason; and with so far forgetting the proprieties as not to hesitate to rob his friends. Stone says of him that he "had been known to exert his eloquence to enkindle a war-spirit in the bosoms of the braves of his nation, and provoke them to take up the hatchet, while he ingeniously avoided the war-path, and availed himself of the absence of the warriors, thus procured, to plunder the goods, and even live-stock, wherever he could—not caring to discriminate between the property of any enemy and that of the absentees of his own people." In a letter to the Duke of Northumberland, in 1805, Brant bestowed on Red Jacket the name "Cow-killer," because, during the Revolution, having exhorted his fellow warriors to behave with courage in an approaching battle and promising to be in the thick of the fight himself, and being missed from the engagement, he was found cutting up a cow belonging to an Indian. Subsequent to the Revolution Brant often openly blamed Red Jacket with causing him trouble and embarrassment during Sullivan's invasion,

"being," he asserted, "the principal cause of the disasters of his people." Indeed, during this campaign Red Jacket had sought to induce the young warriors and the less resolute chiefs to agree to submission to the American army. A runner was sent to Sullivan's camp for this purpose, but the astute Brant, having knowledge of this treason, frustrated the purposes of Red Jacket by having the bearer of the American flag of truce killed and his papers taken.

Although nominally and officially at peace with the United States after the treaty of Ft Stanwix in 1784, the Six Nations were nevertheless dissatisfied with some of its terms, and for ten years subsequently had to be conciliated with great care and at much expense. During this period, 1786-94, Red Jacket sought to thwart the Indian policy of the United States in regard to the hostile western tribes, but Wayne's victory over the confederated tribes in 1794 sobered the thoughts of the malcontents among the Indian tribes.

In pursuance of the invitation to the chiefs of the Six Nations to visit the President, given by Col. Pickering at Painted Post in June 1791, two months after the remarkable council held with these Indians at Buffalo Creek by Col. Proctor, a friendly delegation, consisting of 50 chiefs of the Six Nations, in the spring of 1792 visited Philadelphia, then the seat of government. It was during this conference that President Washington, as a token of friendship and esteem, gave a silver medal, bearing his own likeness, to Red Jacket, who then and in later life showed his appreciation of this gift with the care he bestowed on it and with the pride with which he was accustomed to wear it. This medal is now in the custody of the Buffalo Historical Society.

Even after the solemn assurances of lasting friendship for the United States by the New York Indians in the War of 1812, the vacillating character and inconstancy of Red Jacket and other prominent chiefs are made plain in a letter addressed to Farmer's Brother and other chiefs by Gen. Porter, dated Chippewa, Canada, July 25, 1814, inviting the Indians to join him at once at that place. Among other things, he wrote: "We shall soon drive the enemy, who dare not show their heads where we go. We want your aid to assist us in the pursuit. You have already lost one glorious opportunity by being absent. We are aware of the conduct of three of your chiefs—Red Jacket, Cornplanter, and Blue Sky. If they do not choose to act for themselves, they should not dissuade others." By this it is seen that at least one American officer openly charged Red Jacket with treason-able conduct, notwithstanding Stone's unintentionally ironical statement that Red Jacket "was no more suspected of treachery than he was of courage, by the American officers in the service."

In 1827 Red Jacket's wife, together with 22 of her Seneca neighbors, joined the church, notwithstanding her husband's threat to leave her should she take such a step. He therefore sullenly carried out his threat, and gave himself over to renewed and unbridled dissipation. But after a few months' absence he meekly returned to his wife, who condescended to receive him on condition that he would not in future interfere with her religious duties. Afterward he faithfully kept his word, and, indeed, at times he even aided her in these duties.

In 1828, at the request of Dr J. W. Francis, of New York city, R. W. Weir painted a likeness of Red Jacket; and in 1829 Catlin also painted a full length life-size portrait of him, representing him standing on Table Rock, Niagara Falls, in accordance with Red Jacket's wishes.

The project of reintering the remains of Red Jacket and the chiefs contemporary with him, lying forsaken in graves on the former Buffalo res., had its inception about 1863, but it did not take definite shape until 1876, when W. C. Bryant, of the Buffalo Historical Society, obtained the consent of the Seneca council to the removal of the bodies. On Oct. 9, 1884, with appropriate ceremonies, the remains were reinterred in Forest Lawn Cemetery, Buffalo, N. Y., where a handsome memorial was unveiled June 22, 1891.

Red Men, Improved Order of. A society of American citizens, originally composed of advocates of individual rights and admirers of Indian character, who adopted as their patron and exemplar the Delaware chief Tammany; but, as it is constituted at the present day, its primary objects are the promotion among men of the exercise and practice of the principles of benevolence and charity, the care and protection of widows and orphans, and the cultivation of friendly relations among those who have entered its circle. The democratic influence which attended its birth has caused the idea that all men are equal to remain its fundamental tenet. There were several patriotic societies at the close of the 18th and the commencement of the 19th century which may have contributed to the rise of the present order. There was organized in Philadelphia, about 1772, a society known as the Sons of Tammany, that may be considered its direct ancestor, the first recorded notice of which is in the Philadelphia Chronicle of May 4, 1772: "On Friday, the 1st instant, a number of Americans, Sons of King Tammany, met at the house of Mr James Byrn, to celebrate the memory of that truly noble chieftain whose friendship was most affectionately manifest to the worthy founder and first settlers of this province. After dinner the circulating glass was crowned with wishes, loyal and patriotic, and the day concluded with much cheerfulness and harmony. It is hoped from this small beginning a society may be formed of great utility to the distressed, as this meeting was more for the purpose of promoting charity and benevolence than mirth and festivity." Subsequently it was the custom of the society to hold a regular festival every year on May 12. On that day the members walked in procession through the streets of Philadelphia, with hats decorated with bucks' tails, to a handsome rural place in the direction of Schuylkill r. which they called the "wigwam," where, after a "long talk," according to Indian custom, and after the "pipe of peace" had been smoked, they spent the day in festivity and mirth. The association continued in this form for some years after the peace with Great Britain, when the owner of the "wigwam," who had generously lent it every year in honor of Tammany, having met with misfortune was compelled to sell it to satisfy his creditors. After the discontinuance of the festive association other societies of a similar character were formed in Philadelphia and New York, bearing the name Tammany; the only one of these continued to the present day is the Tammany Society of New York city. See Tammany.

The present Order of Red Men, like the original society, is a social, fraternal, and benevolent organization commemorating the customs, traditions, and history of the Indians, and is purely American. Its proceedings are secret only in so far as secrecy is expedient and proper. Its organization, proceedings, and mode of initiating members imitate Indian customs, and Indian terms are used to designate the officers and in conducting ceremonies. The Order of Red Men has passed through three phases. The first was its existence as originally organized in Philadelphia. After the colonies declared for separate government began the second phase, when it is said these societies became intensely popular, and their anniversaries bade fair to excel Independence day in public esteem. They were thus auspiciously continued until a short time before the second war with Great Britain, when Gen. Dearborn, Secretary of War, looking on them as demoralizing to soldiers, issued orders prohibiting them in the army. It is asserted that the third phase of the order began in 1813 at Ft Mifflin, on Delaware r., 4 m. below Philadelphia, among volunteer soldiers called Junior Artillerists. An unbroken chain in the existence of the society thus formed continued in Pennsylvania and neighboring states, but without an attempt at concurrent action until 1857. On Oct. 21 of that year a grand demonstration, including a public parade in full regalia, with banners and other insignia, took place at Lancaster, Pa. But the Order of Red Men as now existing seems to have taken its form from the Red Men's Society, Tribe No. 1, of Maryland, organized Mar. 12, 1834, at the house of D. McDonald, in Baltimore. This tribe subsequently assumed supreme authority, which was not challenged by the older tribe in Pennsylvania, and its authority has been acknowledged ever since. In a charter granted by the Maryland legislature on Mar. 14, 1835, the name was changed to the "Improved Order of Red Men." The organization is now represented in every state and territory in the Union. The total membership in 1905 was 382,121, the number of tribes 4,206, and the assets of the organization about $4,000,000. (C. T.)

Red River Assiniboin. An Assiniboin band, estimated in 1829 at 24 tipis (Coues, Henry-Thompson Jour., II, 522, 1897), living w. of the Otaopabine, w. Canada.

Red River Chippewa. A former Chippewa band in w. Minnesota.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 332, 1873.

Red Sticks. Among the Creeks and their cousins, the Seminole, all warlike functions, including the declaration of war, the organizing of war parties, and the burning of captives, were in charge of the officers of certain clans, which clans were designated for this reason 'bearers of the red' in contradistinction to the 'white' or peace clans, in the towns of which all peace treaties were negotiated and where it was forbidden to shed human blood. The symbol of the declaration of war was the erection of a tall pole, painted red, in the public square, as a rallying point for the warriors, whence the popular term "Red Sticks" applied by writers both to these towns and to the hostile war element which at various periods made headquarters in them, particularly during the Creek and Seminole war. The most noted towns controlled by the war clans were Atasi of the Upper Creeks, Kawita of the Lower Creeks, and Mikasuki of the Seminole. See Baton Rouge. (J. M.)

Red Thunder. A chief of the Pahaksa or Cuthead band of Yanktonai Sioux in the early part of the 19th century; also known as Shappa, the Beaver. Lieut. Z. M. Pike saw him at the great council at Prairie du Chien, Wis., in Apr. 1806, and pronounced him the most gorgeously dressed of any chief he met. With his famous son Waneta he enlisted with the British in the War of 1812, and fought at Ft Meigs and at Sandusky, Ohio. He was killed under tragic circumstances by the Chippewa on Red r. of the North in 1823. Col. Robert Dickson, the British agent in the W. during 1812-15, married a sister of Red Thunder. (D. R.)

Red Town. A former Seminole town on Tampa bay, w. Florida.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822.

Redwing. The name of a succession of chiefs of the former Khemnichan band of Mdewakanton Sioux, residing on the w. shore of L. Pepin, Minn., where the city of Redwing now stands. At least four chiefs in succession bore the appellation, each being distinguished by another name. The elder Redwing is heard of as early as the time of the Pontiac war, when he visited Mackinaw, and was in alliance with the English in the Revolution. He was succeeded by his son, Walking Buffalo (Tatankamani), who enlisted in the British cause in 1812. The name was maintained during two succeeding generations, but disappeared during the Sioux outbreak of 1862-65. The family was less influential than the Little Crows or the Wabashas of the same tribe. (D. R.)

Religion. For the purpose of a brief description of the religion of the American Indians we may define religion as that group of concepts and acts which spring from the relation of the individual to the outer world, so far as these relations are not considered as due to physical forces the action of which is accounted for by purely rationalistic considerations. The scope of religious concepts will depend to a certain extent, therefore, on the knowledge of the laws of nature; and, since the border-line of the natural and the supernatural, as conceived in the mind of primitive man, does not coincide with our view of this subject, there will be marked differences between the scope of religion among civilized nations and that among less advanced peoples. For instance, the causal relations determining the movements of the stars are recognized by civilized man; but at an earlier time it was believed that the positions of the stars influenced in a mysterious manner the fates of man and that their movements could be controlled by his will. Among tribes which held to the latter opinion, views relating to the heavenly bodies would form part of the religion of the people; while among those peoples to which the causal relations determining the motions of the stars are known, these motions are no longer subject to religious interpretations.

Owing to the different point of view, it may also happen that certain ideas of primitive man, which from our standpoint would have to be considered as religious in character, are interpreted by the people holding them as purely rationalistic. In our judgment, for instance, sympathetic cures, which are believed in by most primitive tribes and even by uneducated people among ourselves, can not be considered as due to any physical effect, while among primitive tribes they may be so viewed. The same is true of certain mythological concepts. If an Indian tribe explains the markings on the skin of the chipmunk as due to the fact that at an early time the grizzly bear scratched its back, this may be to the mind of the Indian a perfectly rationalistic explanation, while to us it would be entirely mysterious. Thus it appears that the general views of nature—the explanations given for the occurrence of natural phenomena—necessarily enter into a consideration of the religions of primitive tribes, even if these explanations should be based on a purely rationalistic attitude on the part of primitive man. The less clear the line between observation and reasoning on the one hand and imagination and inference due to emotional states on the other, the less sharply drawn will be the line between what may be called science and religion. In accordance with the definition given before, those concepts that spring from the relation of the individual to the outer world, and the form of which depends on imagination and emotion, may be said to form the tenets of religion.

When religious acts are considered in greater detail, it appears that here also acts prompted by rationalistic considerations are not sharply separated from others dictated by imagination and emotion. Thus, when a medicine-man pursues and captures the fleeing soul of a sick man, he may follow out by his acts in a rational way opinions based largely on reasoning, although deeply affected in their origin by such emotions as fear and love. When, on the other hand, he tries to gain greater efficiency by putting himself into a state of emotional excitement, in which he believes his chances of success are enhanced, his acts become religious, in the stricter sense of the term. This lack of sharp division between rationalistic and religious forms of activity is found everywhere. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that many actions are performed without any conscious reason, except so far as they are required by custom. This is true particularly of actions that are considered as proper, like those determined by rules regulating the behavior of the young to the old, or of the common people to the nobility; or also of actions that are considered as ethical, like those of hospitality and of pity. Here the line of demarcation between religious activities and others not connected with religion becomes even less sharp, because it often happens that actions originally performed without any particular reason or for purely rationalistic purposes are secondarily given religious motives. It thus follows that religious views and actions are not primarily connected with ethical concepts. Only in so far as man in his religious relations to the outer world endeavors to follow certain rules of conduct, in order to avoid evil effects, is a relation between primitive religion and ethics established.

The religious concepts of the Indians may be described in two groups—those that concern the individual, and those that concern the social group, such as tribe and clan. The fundamental concept bearing on the religious life of the individual is the belief in the existence of magic power, which may influence the life of man, and which in turn may be influenced by human activity. In this sense magic power must be understood as the wonderful qualities which are believed to exist in objects, animals, men, spirits, or deities, and which are superior to the natural qualities of man. This idea of magic power is one of the fundamental concepts that occur among all Indian tribes. It is what is called manito by the Algonquian tribes; wakanda, by the Siouan tribes; orenda, by the Iroquois; sulia, by the Salish; nanulak, by the Kwakiutl, and tamanous, by the Chinook. Notwithstanding slight differences in the signification of these terms, the fundamental notion of all of them is that of a power inherent in the objects of nature which is more potent than the natural powers of man. This idea seems adequately expressed by our term "wonderful"; and it is hardly necessary to introduce an Indian term, as has often been attempted. Among the American terms, the word manito (q. v.; see also Orenda, Otkon, Oyaron) has been most frequently used to express this idea. The degree to which the magic power of nature is individualized differs considerably among various tribes. Although the belief in the powers of inanimate objects is common, we find in America that, on the whole, animals, particularly the larger ones, are most frequently considered as possessed of such magic power. Strong anthropomorphic individualization also occurs, which justifies us in calling these powers deities. It seems probable that among the majority of tribes, besides the belief in the power of specific objects, a belief in a magic power that is only vaguely localized, exists. In cases where this belief is pronounced, the notion sometimes approaches the concept of a deity, or of a great spirit which is hardly anthropomorphic in its character. This is the case, for instance, among the Tsimshian of British Columbia and among the Algonquian tribes of the Great Lakes, and also in the figure of the Tirawa of the Pawnee.

As stated before, the whole concept of the world—or, in other words, the mythology of each tribe—enters to a very great extent into their religious concepts and activities. The mythologies are highly specialized in different parts of North America; and, although a large number of myths are the common property of many American tribes, the general view of the world appears to be quite distinct in various parts of the continent. Taking into consideration the continent of America as a whole, we find a type of explanation of the world which is psychologically quite different from the familiar Semitic type. In the Semitic religions eternal existence appeared as an unintelligible problem, and the mind preferred to assume a beginning which was accounted for by transferring the existing world, as it was known by observation, into the thought of a creator, and interpreting the creation as a projection of his thoughts by his will-power into objective existence. The Indian mind, on the other hand, accepts the eternal existence of the world, and accounts for its specific form by the assumption that events which once happened in early times settled for once and all the form in which the same kind of event must continue to occur. • For instance, when the bear produced the stripes of the chipmunk by scratching its back, this determined that all chipmunks were to have such stripes; or when an ancestor of a clan was taught a certain ceremony, that same ceremony must be performed by all future generations. This idea is not by any means confined to America, but is found among primitive peoples of other continents as well, and occurs even in Semitic cults.

Considering American mythologies in their broadest outlines, the following areas may be distinguished: (1) The Eskimo area, the mythology of which is characterized by an abundance of purely human hero-tales, and a very small number of traditions accounting for the origin of animals, and these generally largely in human setting. (2) The North Pacific Coast area, characterized by a large cycle of transformer myths, in which the origin of many of the arts of man is accounted for, as well as the peculiarities of many animals; the whole forming a very disconnected heterogeneous mass of traditions. (3) Allied to these appear the traditions of the Western plateau and of the Mackenzie basin area, a region in which animal tales abound, many accounting for the present conditions of the world, the whole being very disconnected and contradictory. (4) The Californian area, the mythologies of which are characterized by a stronger emphasis laid on creation by will-power than is found in most other parts of the American continent. (5) The principal characteristic of the mythologies of the area of the Great Plains, the eastern woodlands, and the arid Southwest, is the tendency to systematization of the myths under the influence of a highly developed ritual. This tendency is more sharply defined in the S. than in the N. and N. E., and has perhaps progressed further than anywhere else among the Pueblos, to whom the origin of the clans and societies seems to give the keynote of mythological concepts; and among the Pawnee, whose contemplation of the stars seems to have given the principal tone to their mythology (see also article Mythology). The religious concepts of the Indians deal largely with the relation of the individual to the magic power mentioned above, and are specialized in accordance with their general mythological concepts, which determine largely the degree to which the powers are personified as animals, spirits, or deities.

Another group of religious concepts, which are not less important than the group heretofore discussed, refers to the relations of the individual to his internal states, so far as these are not controlled by the will, and are therefore considered as subject to external magic influences. Most important among these are dreams, sickness, and death. These may be produced by obsession, or by external forces which compel the soul to leave the body. In this sense the soul is considered by almost all tribes as not subject to the individual will; it may be abstracted from the body by hostile forces, and it may be damaged and killed. The concept of the soul itself shows a great variety of forms. Very often the soul is identified with life, but we also find commonly the belief in a multiplicity of souls. Thus, among the Eskimo, the name is considered as one of the souls of man, another soul belongs to the body, a third one is independent of the body. The soul is also identified with the blood, the bones, the shadow, the nape of the neck (see Soul). Based on these ideas is also the belief in the existence of the soul after death. Thus, in the belief of the Algonquian Indians of the Great Lakes, the souls of the deceased are believed to reside in the far west with the brother of the great culture-hero. Among the Kutenai the belief prevails that the souls will return at a later period, accompanying the culture-hero. Sometimes the land from which the ancestors of the tribe have sprung, which in the S. is often conceived of as underground, is of equal importance.

Since the belief in the existence of magic powers is very strong in the Indian mind, all his actions are regulated by the desire to retain the good will of those friendly to him, and to control those that are hostile.

The first means of retaining the good will of the friendly power is the strict observance of a great variety of proscriptions. An important group of these may be combined under the term "taboo" (q. v.). Among these, furthermore, food taboos are particularly common. Every tribe of America, no matter how scanty their means of subsistence may have been, had certain kinds of tabooed food—that is, food forbidden, either permanently or at certain seasons, or on certain occasions. Thus, one division of the Omaha were forbidden to eat the shoulder of the buffalo, while another one was forbidden to eat the elk; the Iroquois were forbidden to eat the animal from which their family name was taken, and the same is true of Pueblo and other clans; the Eskimo must not eat caribou and walrus at the same season; the Navaho must not touch flesh of the bear, nor the Zuni anything that lives in the water.

Not less numerous are the taboos of work. These are perhaps nowhere so highly developed as among the Eskimo, among whom work on caribou-skins, seal-skins, metals, ice, and heather is forbidden under certain conditions. Here belong, also, the taboos of story-telling, and of playing certain games at certain seasons, which are quite common. Of great importance are the taboos intended to prevent the evil effects of impurity. Thus we find a large number of taboos forbidding menstruating women, murderers, and mourners from performing certain kinds of work. They must not touch fresh food lest the magic powers controlling the food supply may be offended.

Social taboos, which are very common in Polynesia, are not so markedly developed in America, although the strict secrecy with which certain sacred actions are performed by privileged members of a tribe is akin to this institution. Thus it is forbidden, except on certain occasions, for any member of the tribe to touch or even see the contents of sacred bundles (see Palladium), and even then only the keeper of the bundle is allowed to open it to view. While all these taboos are essentially negative in their character, forbidding certain actions in order to avoid giving offense, there are positive acts which are required for the same purpose. Some of these might well be called rules of ethical conduct, although the one reason given for them is the endeavor to retain the good will of the wonderful powers of nature. All the numerous regulations which are found all over the continent, and intended to retain the good will of the food animals, and which are essentially signs of respect shown to them, belong to this class. Dogs must not gnaw the bones of food animals, because this is a sign of disrespect.

The bear, after having been killed, receives marks of reverence; and the first game animals obtained at the beginning of the hunting season must be treated with particular care. The complicated customs relating to buffalo hunting, and the salmon ceremonials of the N. W. Indians, as well as the whale ceremonials of the Eskimo, may also be given as examples. Respectful behavior toward old people and generally decent conduct are also often counted among such required acts. Here may also be included the numerous customs of purification that are required in order to avoid the ill will of the powers. These, however, may better be considered as constituting one of the means of controlling magic power, which form a very large part of the religious observances of the American Indians.

The Indian is not satisfied with the attempt to avoid the ill will of the powers, but he tries also to make them subservient to his own needs. This end may be attained in a variety of ways. Perhaps the most characteristic of North American Indian methods of gaining control over supernatural powers is that of the acquisition of one of them as a personal protector. Generally this process is called the acquiring of a manito; and the most common method of acquiring it is for the young man during the period of adolescence to purify himself by fasting, bathing, and vomiting, until his body is perfectly clean and acceptable to the supernatural beings. At the same time the youth works himself by these means, by dancing, and sometimes also by means of drugs, into a trance, in which he has a vision of the guardian spirit which is to protect him throughout life. These means of establishing communication with the spirit world are in very general use, also at other periods of life (see Black drink, Dance, Ordeals, Peyote, Tobacco). The magic power that man thus acquires may give him special abilities; it may make him a successful hunter, warrior, or shaman; or it may give him power to acquire wealth, success in gambling, or the love of women.

While the above is the most common method of acquiring magic power, other means are well known among the American Indians, particularly among those tribes in which strong clan organizations prevail. They believe that wonderful power may be attained by inheritance. There are also numerous cases, as among the Arapaho and Blackfeet (Siksika), where the privilege of acquiring it and the control over it may be purchased. Among the American Eskimo the idea prevails that it may be transmitted by teaching and by bodily contact with a person who controls such powers. Ordinarily its possession is considered so sacred that it must not be divulged except in cases of extreme danger, but among other tribes it may be made known to the whole tribe. In a few cases the opinion prevails that such powers exist in certain localities, but can not be acquired by individuals.

Another means of controlling the powers of nature is by prayer, which may be directed either to the protecting spirit of the individual or to other powers. Objects of prayer may be protection in danger, removal of sickness, the obtaining of food or other material benefits, or a more general and abstract request for the blessing of the powers. Many prayers are addressed in fixed form or contain at least certain old formulas.

Another way of invoking the protection of the powers is through the use of charms (also called fetishes, q. v.). The charm is either believed to be the seat of magic power, or it may be a symbol of such power, and its action may be based on its symbolic significance. Of the former kind are presumably many objects contained in the sacred bundles of certain Indians, which are believed to be possessed of sacred powers; while symbolic significance seems to prevail in charms like the stones worn by the North Pacific Coast Indians, which are believed to harden the skin against missiles of hostile shamans, or the magic whip of wolf-skin of the Eskimo, which is believed to have the power of driving away spirits.

Symbolic actions are also made use of. Such acts are, for instance, the setting-up of prayer-sticks (q. v.), which are meant to convey man's wishes to the powers. Often these wishes are indicated by special attachments, expressing in symbolic or pictographic manner the thing wished for. Somewhat related to such symbolic actions are also all processes of divination, in which, by a symbolic act, the propitiousness of the proposed undertaking is ascertained.

Still more potent means of influencing the powers are offerings and sacrifices. On the whole, these are not so strongly developed in North America as they are in other parts of the world. In many regions human sacrifices were common—for instance, in Mexico and Yucatan—while in northern America they are known only in rare instances, as among the Pawnee. However, many cases of torture, particularly of self-torture, must be reckoned here (see Ordeals, Sun Dance). Other bloody sacrifices are also rare in North America. We may mention the sacrifice of the dog among the Iroquois. Only to a limited extent do we find the tendency of considering the killing of game as a bloody sacrifice. On the other hand, sacrifices of tobacco smoke, of corn, and of parts of food, of small manufactured objects, and of symbolic objects, are very common. These gifts may be offered to any of the supernatural powers with the intent of gaining their assistance and avoiding their enmity.

Still another way of gaining control over supernatural powers is by incantations, which in a way are related to prayers, but which act rather through the magic influence of the words. Therefore the traditional form of these incantations is rigidly adhered to. They occur frequently among the Arctic tribes of the continent, but are not by any means lacking among others, who believe that the recitation of a short formula may aid in reaching a desired end. In the same way that incantations are related to prayer, certain acts and charms are related to offerings. We find among almost all Indian tribes the custom of performing certain acts, which are neither symbolic nor offerings, nor other attempts to obtain the assistance of superior beings, but which are effective through their own potency. Such acts are the use of lucky objects intended to secure good fortune; or the peculiar treatment of animals, plants, and other objects, in order to bring about a change of weather.

There is also found among most Indian tribes the idea that the supernatural powers, if offended by transgressions of rules of conduct, may be propitiated by punishment. Such punishment may consist in the removal of the offending individual, who may be killed by the members of the tribe, or the propitiation may be accomplished by milder forms of punishment. Of particular interest among these is confession as a means of propitiation, which is found among the Athapascans, the Iroquois, and the Eskimo. Other forms of punishment are based largely on the idea of purification by fasting, bathing, and vomiting. Among the Plains Indians the vow to perform a ceremony or another act agreeable to the powers is considered an efficient means of gaining their good will or of atoning for past offenses.

Protection against disease is also sought by the help of superhuman powers. These practices have two distinct forms, according to the fundamental conception of disease. Disease is conceived of principally in two forms—either as due to the presence of a material object in the body of the patient, or as an effect of the absence of the soul from the body. The cure of disease is intrusted to the shamans or medicine-men, who obtain their powers generally by the assistance of guardian spirits, or who may personally be endowed with magic powers. It is their duty to discover the material disease which is located in the patient's body, and which they extract by sucking or pulling with the hands; or to go in pursuit of the absent soul, to recover it, and to restore it to the patient. Both of these forms of shamanism are found practically all over the continent, but in some regions—for instance, in California—the idea of material bodies that cause sickness is particularly strongly developed; while in other regions the idea of the absence of the soul seems to be more marked. In treating the patient, the shamans almost everywhere use various means to work themselves into a state of excitement, which is produced by singing, by the use of the drum and rattle, and by dancing. The belief also widely prevails that unpropitious conditions may counteract the work of the shaman, and that for this reason particular care must be taken to remove all disturbing and impure elements from the place where the shamanistic performance is held. When the shaman has to have intercourse with the spirits, whom he visits in their own domain, or when he has to pursue the soul of the patient, we find frequently sleight-of-hand employed, such as the tying of the hands of the shaman, who, when his soul leaves the body, is believed to free himself with the help of the spirits. (See Magic, Medicine and Medicine-men, Shamans and Priests.)

The belief that certain individuals can acquire control over the powers has also led to the opinion that they may be used to harm enemies. The possession of such control is not always beneficial, but may be used also for purposes of witchcraft (q. v.). Hostile shamans may throw disease into the bodies of their enemies, or they may abduct their souls. They may do harm by sympathetic means, and control the will-power of others by the help of the supernatural means at their disposal. Witchcraft is everywhere considered as a crime, and is so punished.

Besides those manifestations of religious belief that relate to the individual, religion has become closely associated with the social structure of the tribes; so that the ritualistic side of religion can be understood only in connection with the social organization of the Indian tribes. Even the fundamental traits of their social organization possess a religious import. This is true particularly of the clans (q. v.), so far as they are characterized by totems (q. v.). The totem is almost always an object of more or less religious reverence to the clan; and there are many cases in which taboos relating to the totemic animal exist, like those previously referred to among the Omaha. Also in cases where the clans have definite political functions, like those of the Omaha and the Iroquois, these functions are closely associated with religious concepts, partly in so far as their origin is ascribed to myths, partly in so far as the functions are associated with the performance of religious rites. The position of officials is also closely associated with definite religious concepts. Thus, the head of a clan at times is considered as the representative of the mythological ancestor of the clan, and as such is believed to be endowed with superior powers; or the position as officer in the tribe or clan entails the performance of certain definite religious functions. In this sense many of the political functions among Indian tribes are closely associated with what may be termed "priestly functions." The religious significance of social institutions is most clearly marked in cases where the tribe, or large parts of the tribe, join in the performance of certain ceremonies which are intended to serve partly a political, partly a religious end. Such acts are some of the intertribal ball-games, the husk of the Creeks, the sundance of the Plains Indians, performances of the numerous warrior societies of the Plains, which will be found treated under these headings. Here also belong the secret societies, which are highly developed among the Pueblos, in California, and on the North Pacific coast. It is characteristic of rituals in many parts of the world that they tend to develop into a more or less dramatic representation of the myth from which the ritual is derived. For this reason the use of masks (q. v.; see also Ceremony) is a common feature of these rituals, in which certain individuals impersonate supernatural beings. In those tribes among which very complex rituals have developed we find the ceremonies frequently in charge of certain officers, who are at the same time the keepers of the sacred objects belonging to the tribe or to the societies (see Altar, Palladium); and it would seem that the whole system of religious beliefs and practices has developed the more systematically, the more strictly the religious practices have come to be in charge of a body of priests. This tendency to systematization of religious beliefs may be observed particularly among the Pueblos and the Pawnee, but it also occurs in isolated cases in other parts of the continent; for instance, among the Bella Coola of British Columbia, and those Algonquian tribes that have the Midewiwin ceremonially fully developed. In these cases we find that frequently an elaborate series of esoteric doctrines and practices exists, which are known to only a small portion of the tribe, while the mass of the people are familiar only with part of the ritual and with its exoteric features. For this reason we often find the religious beliefs and practices of the mass of a tribe rather heterogeneous as compared with the beliefs held by the priests. Among many of the tribes in which priests are found, we find distinct esoteric societies, and it is not by any means rare that the doctrines of one society are not in accord with those of another. All this is clearly due to the fact that the religious ideas of the tribe are derived from many different sources, and have been brought into order at a later date by the priests charged with the keeping of the tribal rituals. Esoteric forms of religion in charge of priests are found among the tribes of the arid region in the Southwest, the tribes of the southern Mississippi basin, and to a less extent among the more northerly tribes on the Plains. It would seem that, on the whole, the import of the esoteric teachings decreases among the more northerly and northeasterly tribes of the continent. It is probably least developed among the Eskimo, the tribes of the Mackenzie basin, and the tribes of the great plateau region, in so far as these have remained uninfluenced by the Plains Indians and by those of the Pacific coast.

On the whole, the Indians incline strongly toward all forms of religious excitement. This is demonstrated not only by the exuberant development of ancient religious forms, but also by the frequency with which prophets (q. v.) have appeared among them, who taught new doctrines and new rites, based either on older religious beliefs, or on teaching partly of Christian, partly of Indian origin. Perhaps the best known of these forms of religion is the Ghost-dance (q. v.), which swept over a large part of the continent during the last decade of the 19th century. But other prophets of similar type and of far-reaching influence were numerous. One of these was Tenskwa-tawa (q. v.), the famous brother of Tecumseh; another, the seer Smohalla (q. v.) of the Pacific coast; and even among the Eskimo such prophets have been known, particularly in Greenland. Renape (contraction of Erendpeu, 'true or native man', 'man properly so called,' man in contrast with anthropomorphic beings). An individual belonging to one of the largest linguistic groups into which the Algonquian family of languages is divided; which has, from a phonetic viewpoint, a closer affinity with Chippewa than with any other group; and which, since the change of r to l, which took place in historic time, has been distinguished as "Lenape". The word is from (1) irēn, 'true', 'genuine', 'properly so called', cognate with Abnaki ürēn, älēn, Micmac ēlēn, Narraganset and Menominee ēnēn, Chippewa īnēn, Cree dialects īyēn, īhēn, īrēn, īlēn, etc.; and (2) -āpeu, 'man,' from (by the regular loss of initial n in composition) the radical word nāpeu, meaning (a) 'man', (b) 'male'. "Renapoaks, for so they [the Roanok] call by that general name all the inhabitants of the whole maine, of what province soever." (Lane, ca. 1586, in Hakluyt, Voy., iii, 260, 1600.) (W. R. G.)

Renapoak (from renape, q. v., and -ak, plural suffix). The Indians formerly of the interior of North Carolina, so called by the Algonquian tribes on Albemarle sd., N. C.—Lane (1586) in Hakluyt, Voy., iii, 317, repr. 1810.

Renville, Gabriel. The last chief of the Sisseton Sioux, to which position he was appointed in 1866 by the War Department. He was a son of Victor and a nephew of the celebrated Joseph Renville. He was born at Sweet Corn's village, Big Stone lake, S. Dak., in Apr. 1824, and died at Sisseton agency, Aug. 26, 1902. His mother was Winona Crawford, daughter of Captain Crawford of the English army and of a daughter of Walking Buffalo Redwing (Tatankamani), chief of the Khemnichan. Gabriel was a valued friend of the whites during the massacre and resulting war of the Sioux outbreak in 1862–65. (D. R.)

Renville, Joseph. The half-Sioux son of a French fur-trader, born at Kaposia (St. Paul), Minn., in 1779. His early childhood was passed in the tipi of his mother, but when about 10 years of age he was taken by his father to Canada and placed under the care of a Catholic priest, from whom he received knowledge of the French language. He came into prominence as a guide to Lieut. Z. M. Pike in 1805, and entered the service of the British in the War of 1812 as interpreter to the Sioux, with the rank of captain. He was present at Ft Meigs and Ft Stephenson, Ohio, and the good conduct of the Indians there was due largely to his influence. He went to the great council at Portage des Sioux (mouth of the Missouri) in 1815 as interpreter, and resigned his British commission and half pay to attach himself thenceforth to the American interest. He organized the Columbia Fur Co., with headquarters on L. Traverse, Minn., and, calling to his assistance many of the bold characters released from other service by the consolidation of the Hudson's Bay and N. W. Fur Cos., was able to meet the American Fur Co. on its own grounds with a competition so strong that the latter was glad to make terms and place the Columbia Co.'s men in charge of its Upper Missouri outfit. At the time of the consolidation Renville established an independent business at Lac qui Parle which he conducted until his death. In 1834 he met Dr. T. S. Williamson, the famous missionary, at Prairie du Chien, out on his first reconnaissance, and arranged with him to go to Lac qui Parle and establish a mission the next year. Williamson returned to Ohio for his family, and the next spring met Renville at Ft Snelling, whence he proceeded to Lac qui Parle, which became the scene of most of his long service with the Sioux. They were soon after joined by Dr S. R. Riggs, and engaged, with Renville's assistance, in the translation of the Scriptures. Renville translated every word of the Bible into the Dakota language, and the missionaries faithfully recorded it; he also rendered them invaluable assistance in the construction of the grammar and dictionary of the Dakota language. In 1841 Renville was chosen and ordained a ruling elder, discharging the duties of his office until his death at Lac qui Parle in Mar. 1846. Many descendants still reside among the Sisseton Sioux in South Dakota. (D. R.)

Reservations. A natural result of land cessions by the Indians to the U. S. Government was the establishment of reservations for the natives. This was necessary not only in order to provide them with homes and with land for cultivation, but to avoid disputes in regard to boundaries and to bring them more easily under control of the Government by confining them to given limits. This policy, which has been followed in Canada under both French and English control, and also to some extent by the colonies, was inaugurated by the United States in 1786. It may be attributed primarily to the increase of the white population and the consequent necessity of confining the aboriginal population to narrower limits. This involved a very important, even radical, change in the habits and customs of the Indians, and was the initiatory step toward a reliance upon agricultural pursuits for subsistence. Reservations in early days, and to a limited extent more recently, were formed chiefly as the result of cessions of land; thus a tribe, in ceding land that it held by original occupancy, reserved from the cession a specified and definite part thereof, and such part was held under the original right of occupancy, but with the consent of the Government, as it was generally expressly stated in the treaty defining the bounds that the part so reserved was "allotted to" or "reserved for" the given Indians, thus recognizing title in the Government. However, as time passed, the method of establishing reservations varied, as is apparent from the following return, showing the method of establishment of the various reservations, given by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his Report for 1890: By Executive order, 56; by Executive order under authority of Congress, 6; by act of Congress, 28; by treaty, with boundaries defined or enlarged by Executive order, 15; by treaty or agreement and act of Congress, 5; by unratified treaty, 1; by treaty or agreement, 51.

The setting aside of reservations by treaty was terminated by the act of Mar. 3, 1871, which brought transactions with the Indians under the immediate control of Congress and substituted simple agreements for solemn treaties. By sundry subsequent laws the matter has been placed in control of the President. Reservations established by Executive order without an act of Congress were not held to be permanent before the general allotment act of Feb. 8, 1887, under which the tenure has been materially changed, and all reservations, whether created by Executive order, by act of Congress, or by treaty, are permanent. Reservations established by Executive order under authority of Congress are those which have been authorized by acts of Congress and their limits defined by Executive order, or first established by Executive order and subsequently confirmed by Congress. The Indian titles which have been recognized by the Government appear to have been (1) the original right of occupancy, and (2) the title to their reservations, which differs in most cases from the original title in the fact that it is derived from the United States. There have been some titles, and a few of them still exist, which the Indian Bureau deems exceptions to this rule, as where the reservation was formed by restricting the original areas or where reservations have been patented to tribes by the Government. Examples of the latter class are the patents to the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Creek nations. In a few instances the Indians purchased the lands forming in whole or in part their reservations. The construction given to these by the Indian Bureau and the courts is that they are not titles in fee simple, for they convey no power of alienation except to the United States, neither are they the same as the ordinary title to occupancy; they are "a base, qualified, or determinable fee," with a possibility of reversion to the United States only, "and the authorities of these nations may cut, sell, and dispose of their timber, and may permit mining and grazing, within the limits of their respective tracts, by their own citizens." The act of Mar. 1, 1889, establishing a United States court in Indian Territory, repealed all laws having the effect of preventing the Five Civilized Tribes in said Territory (Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole) from entering into leases or contracts with others than their own citizens for mining coal for a period not exceeding ten years. As a general rule the Indians on a reservation could make no leases of land, sales of standing timber, or grants of mining privileges or rights of way to railways without the authority of Congress. On the other hand, it was obligatory upon the Government to prevent any intrusion, trespass, or settlement on the lands of any tribe or nation of Indians unless the tribe or nation had given consent by agreement or treaty.

The idea of removing the Indians residing e. of the Mississippi to reservations w. of that river was a policy adopted at an early date. The first official notice of it appears in the act of Mar. 26, 1804, "erecting Louisiana into two territories, and providing the temporary government thereof." By treaty with the Choctaw in 1820 they had been assigned a new home in the W., to include a considerable portion of w. Arkansas, with all that part of the present Oklahoma s. of the South Canadian and Arkansas rs. In 1825 President Monroe reported to the Senate a formal "plan of colonization or removal" (see Schoolcraft, III, 573 et seq., 1853), of all tribes then residing e. of the Mississippi, to the same general western region. In accordance with this plan the present Oklahoma, with the greater portion of what is now Kansas, was soon after constituted a territory, under the name of "Indian Territory," as a permanent home for the tribes to be removed from the settled portions of the United States. Most of the northern portion of the territory was acquired by treaty purchase from the Osage and Kansa. A series of treaties was then inaugurated by which, before the close of 1840, almost all the principal Eastern tribes and tribal remnants had been removed to the "Indian Territory," the five important Southern tribes—Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole—being guaranteed autonomy under the style of "Nations." By subsequent legislation Kansas was detached from the Territory, most of the emigrant tribes within the bounds of Kansas being again removed to new reservations s. of the boundary line. By other and later treaties lands within the same Territory were assigned to the actual native tribes—Kiowa, Comanche, Wichita, Cheyenne, etc.—whose claims had been entirely overlooked in the first negotiations, which considered only the Osage and Kansa along the eastern border. Other tribes were brought in at various periods from Texas, Nebraska, and farther n., to which were added, as prisoners of war, the Modoc of California (1873), the Nez Percés of Oregon and Idaho (1878), and the Chiricahua Apache of Arizona (1889), until the Indian population of the Territory comprised some 40 officially recognized tribes.

An unoccupied district near the center of the Territory, known as Oklahoma, had become the subject of controversy with intruding white settlers, and was finally thrown open to settlement in 1889. In 1890 the whole western portion of Indian Territory was created into a separate territory under the name of Oklahoma. In the meantime, under provisions of an allotment act passed in 1887 (see Land tenure), agreements were being negotiated with the resident tribes for the opening of the reservation to white settlement. In 1906 a similar arrangement was consummated with the five autonomous tribes of the eastern section, or Indian Territory—the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole—together with the several small tribes in the N. E. corner of Indian Territory. In the following year, 1907, the whole of the former Indian Territory was created into a single state under the name of Oklahoma.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the number of reservations in the United States in 1908, including the 19 Spanish grants to the Pueblo Indians, was 161, aggregating 52,013,010 acres, as follows:
